TO-DAY'S STORY.

THE PUREST OF GOLD.
"But, mother, he is the best dressed boy in school, and Aunt Emmeline is so particular," said Philip.

"All's not gold that glitters," quoted his mother, with a wise smile, "and I think your aunt is more particular about his dress than about his character."

"Well, what have you against George Glaston, mother?"

"I have not known him long enough to be able to form a correct opinion of him, but judging from what little I have seen of him, he seems to think too much of his own wealth and social position. He has been only a couple of months, and yet he tries to domineer over the other boys in a way that is not at all becoming in a newcomer."

"Oh, that is only his way," said Philip, frowning because a little uncomfortable as he recalled instances of George's lordly manners.

"He is so plain," said his mother. "Your aunt's note said that you could invite any boy you wanted, and if you would like to take George Glaston with you, I have no objection."

"There is no objection," exclaimed Philip, snatching his cap and rushing out of the door. "Hi, George!" he called. "Wait a minute, I've something to tell you."

George halted until Philip reached him. As soon as Philip could get his breath, he began: "Mother got a note this morning from Aunt Emmeline, and Uncle Jim has to go away for a week. He invited me to come out and stay until he comes back, and I want to go."

Philip paused, waiting for the outburst of gratitude which he was sure would follow his announcement. None came, however, and he looked at George inquiringly. George smiled contentedly.

"Our folks talk of going to Atlantic City in a few weeks," he began. "I want to interrupt him. 'Oh, we'll be back next week,' he said; and then a little stiffly, 'Of course, if you don't want to go—'

"Oh, yes, I'll go," said George, quickly. "I was delighted, but I wished to impress Philip with the idea that a boy who was going to Atlantic City in a fortnight could not be expected to make an advance over a trip of a few miles into the country."

"We're to start on Thursday morning, on the nine train, and go as far as Wilkesburg. Uncle Jim will be there to get on the train as we get off. He'll leave the horse and buggy tied up at the corner, and we're to go and get it and drive out to Aunt Emmeline's."

"Philip's face was not so animated as at first. He felt hurt and indignant that George made so little of what seemed to him a wonderful piece of good fortune. He felt, however, he made excuses for his friend, and after exchanging a few words at the station, the boys parted.

"Uncle Jim gave them a hasty greeting as he boarded the train, just as the boys stepped off the next Thursday morning. As he reached the platform, he called to his nephew: "Be sure to drive Dick your self; maybe your friend is not used to horses. When they came to where the horse was tied, George jumped into the buggy and gathered up the lines, while Philip untied the horse. He still held them when Philip sat down beside him. "There's nothing about driving a horse," he said, with a lofty air. "I never drove one, but I know I can."

"But Uncle Jim said for me to drive him," said Philip.

"Oh, come now, your uncle didn't know how I would drive. Why, what in the world?" for the buggy wheel had collided with an immense stone, and the occupants were almost bounced out upon the road.

"It drove," said Philip, decidedly.
