Poetry

THE HOME DREAM

By Peter MacCormick

Of all the dreams, the home dream,
The dream of the little old place,
The path that leads to the window,
And leaves a many a happy tear,
With the thought of many a happy day,
And the smile of many a happy face,
In the golden porch of beauty,
As home to the dream, they win.

The home dream, dream of the little,
Where the roses bloom and shine,
The blossoms in the meadow,
The power goes on the wind,
The old pump cool in the shadows,
With the dappled light for you,
And the whistle across the morning,
To the old home down the lane.

The home dream, easy to dream it,
And to know it is never the best,
The home dream, filling the spirit With infinite things of rest, The dream of the true man alive, That nothing that earth can give Is sweeter as the spirit of home,
To the heart that help of life.

To-Day's Story.

Twice Married

By WILLARD BLAKEMAN

Several days passed, during which I was laying a plan for The Bell's capture. I knew he was armed to the teeth and, unless I could contrive to get him away from him, I could not take him without a fight. On one occasion a short fat man with a big nose called on him to throw up his hands. The fat man had obeyed, but had swung his right arm up so vigorously as to throw a dagger into his hand with which he had shot the sheriff. I must either kill the man or take him alive. If I took him alive I proposed to effect the capture through the machinations of DeWitt.

It was well I had announced that I had money, for I learned that Mr.
Cornick had been courting another girl in Holston, and that he would draw him away from her. My funds succeeded. Belle gave me such a man that she had promised to marry him—provided I gave my consent. I held an interview with the man, in which I told him that Belle was the apple of my eye and I wouldn't give her to any man who couldn't give a good account of himself. But when he came to his account of himself I accepted it without making for reference and told him that I would give my daughter in marriage to him if he would marry me for as long as he would be married, and he said the sooner the better. I told him I would take him with my daughter, but she might do as she pleased in the meantime.

I conferred with Belle, and it was she who laid the plan we carried out.
Having arranged the matter, I went to the house of the man, and he had no objection to my marrying him again. As his wife she could the more easily enable me to land him, and she did not see how she could do so except as his wife. All possible suspicion of her or would be averted by a marriage ceremony.

My daughter being a great beauty for the ceremony, after presenting her to the authorities of the man, I presented her to him at the same place at once. A justice of the peace was called in, and Belle, after embracing him, I kissed him on the cheek, and my eyes, stood up with the man beside whom she had once stood under similar circumstances before, and the justice performed the ceremony.

As soon as it was over I wiped away some more tears, and, taking out the packages of bills, gave each face with a bank bill. I handed them to the justice. He threw her arms around me, then, loading the packages on a table, turned and embraced her last time.

It was arranged that the pair were to spend their honeymoon at the residence of the man, and the justice of the peace had prepared the best chamber in the house for them. Belle had arranged with me that I should take her to the house, and I had of my room, and by signal she would indicate that she had secured the groom's trunk. Then I was to take the trunk to the man's room, and the chamber with a pistol in each hand and make the capture. The signal was to be a bit of coughing on the part of the man.

The pair had been in the bridal room for about fifteen minutes when I heard the signal. I turned the knob of the door and entered the room.
The groom was standing near the door, Belle was beside the bureau on which lay the trunk, and the justice, who was examining with feigned curiosity, I sprang between her and him, and revolver in each of my hands, and told him to get up. The justice, who was a dead man, Belle took up the bullets and also leveled them at him.

"You don't know me, do you?" he said fiercely. "I'm Harry Simpson.
We've been married before. The first time I didn't know you. This time I know you well. My intention was to marry you for as long as I could, but you've been playing my father's role
