Nothing growing in vegetable gardens should produce some vegetables which can be stored for winter use.

These vegetables are: BEETS, CARROTS, PARSNIPS, AND HAMPS.

These are the most important members of the root vegetable family.

They are usually grown for winter purposes, though beets and carrots are raised by many in their earlier stages of growth.

All these demand protection from the frost during the winter months.

The best method is to cover them with straw or other material.

In the fall the beets should be pulled up and the tops cut off.

They should be stored in a cool, dry place.

Carrots should be pulled up and the tops cut off.
