To-Day's Story

The Old Auto

By Gilbert Webster

The crowning ambition of Neil Borden was to possess an automobile. He began saving money to that end, but the process was a slow one. He was a bright, rubleund young man of twenty-two, earned sixty dellurs a month as a clerk, and was too good-natured and satisfied with life to quarrel or complain. He was free-hearted, ingenious, but simple and credulous, and as he had never done anything to set the world on fire, was set down as medlocre, and contented with being classed in that category.

As said, Nell longed for an automobile, and had saved up something towards it, and then a queer freak of fate, or rather misadventure, brought the coveted object of his desire direct to his doorstep. A bird of evil omen, adventurer, swindler and soldier of fortune named Boyden, looking for a place to light, swooped down upon Fairview to interest those having money in a gold mine promotion. They had been bitton before, however, and Boyden met with little success. He kept his automobile in an old shed, all that was left of structural evidence on a lot where the house had burned down. He sent for a partner in crime, one Davlin, to join him and select some other territory containing gullible investors. Davlin arrived at Fairview, many seas over, took it upon himself to appropriate the auto out for a spin, and about midnight, at his hotel, Boyden was called out of bed to the tele-

"It's me," was announced in maudlin tones.

"Who is me?" demanded Boyden. "Joe Davlin, of course. Say, Royden. I'm all in, and I've run the machine into a telegraph pole and pretty nigh smashed it to finders. You'll have to got some garage machine to baul us into town." Boyden's keen eyes sparkled. He was never at a loss to turn an incident to his own advantage. "You get right to the hotel here," he ordered his befuddled friend mandatorily. "Leave the machine where is. Don't say a word to anybody about the accident. Do just as I say, or I'll throw you over for good." In the course of an hour Daviln arrived at the hotel. Boyden got him to bed. Then he used the phone liberally. He seut word to the office of the city company insuring his automobile against theft, that it had been stelen.

himself, feeling that he had done a good bours work. Next day the insurance adjuster arived. The local watchman had found the wrecked machine, minus its tires, which someone had stolen. There could be no doubt that it had been stolen and wrecked. Boyden received three times what he would have taken for the machine and left for new felds of adventure and speculation.

It happened that Nefl came upon the adjuster, anxious to sottle the affair and get back to the city. The wreak was offered to the local garage for

"I wouldn't give $50," remarked the garage man contemptuously. "ake it for $50," pressed the to sui ... ico adjuster eagerly. "Don't want it at any price." "Forty?"

"I'll give forty," spoke up Well, and he bargain was clinched on the spot. Ned had a friend who operated a small machine shop, and to his place he had the wrecked auto taken. The latter was friendly and clever. He patched up the disjointed machine, happened to have a set of solid rubber tires that had been once used on a truck, and, clumsy, grinding, missing are regularly, but going just the same, the machine tore proudly about the the jeers of those who criticised the old rattletrap. "Walter," sobbed Gabrielle pathetially, "I am yours till death!" All this and much more Nell everheard, hammer suspended, his good, sympathetic honrt stirred to his depths. At the end of ten minutes he understood the situation complete.

Here were two gentle souls pursued by an ogre in the shape of a meretriclous relative and guardian, who sought to rend them rudely apart and crush their mutual love under his feet. It should not be! Nell startled the cooing, calculating pair by abruptly confronting them.

"Friends," he announced clearly. T've been cavesdropping. I overheard all you said, and I'm going to help Gabrielle clung closer to her brave lover. Walter scanned hopefully the open, honest face of the intruder. "How can you help us?" he questioned dublously. "By-taking you to Rosebury in my

"But the roads may be watched." "I won't take the roads," explained Neil, "that is, the traversed roads. Here's the proposition; if you think that striking Rosebury after dark by an untraveled route you can manage to reach this minister friend without being discovered, I'll get you there."

"You will!" "Without fail!" "I'll make it the best day's work you ever did," pledged Walter Young. "See here, friend, I'm not marrying this jewel of an angel for money. I've got more of it than she has. It's a case of genuine, disinterested love and a cruel, scheming guardian." "I guessed that," nodded Neil in a chipper way. "Now let me explain to you. There's a half road west; no one ever uses it now. It runs by the old glass factory that burned down. It's made up of refuse and cinders that would ruin ordinary tires in ten minutes. I've got solid ones. Folks have feered at my old machine, but all the same it can make that trip, and they couldn't even begin it."

"Oh, Walter, this is droadful!" paipitated Gabrielle, as, an hour later, in the dark the old auto bumped and glass works road.

"Not when it throws you into my arms !" cried Walter jubilantly, "Think of our good fortune in running across this genuinely fine young fellow, with a heart big as the moon!" With a whis the automobile finally relied out into a smeeth country lane.

"I think," spoke Walter, after brief thought, "that I'll take no risks. I'll leave you two here, go for Mr. Bothwell and we'll get married before we venture into town."

He was gone an hour. He returned with his friend. There, in the automobile, the solemn words were presounced that made the runaways man and wife.

"Fer you," spoke Walter Young, taktng Neil aside and pressing a folded slip of paper into the hand of their gallant chauffour. "It's a check, and good, and none too big for a man whe has helped me with the best little girl in the world!" When Nell Borden opened the check.

back at Fairview, four hours later, he found it to be for one thousand dellars. The adventure it commemorated had awakened latent remance in his heart. He could afford to think of a life companion now, and did. choice fertunately fell upon a sweet souled creature who did not disdain. riding in the old automobile, and Nail made that the test of her worthiness.

Maple sugar is the quickest money making harvest in all your business of farming. It needs no seeding. It is all harvest, and what is more the harvest is quickly turned into real money."

THE DEPUTATION from Sim coe and York counties which waited on the Government last week were told by Premier Hearst that it is now too late to secure sufficient peat to alleviate the fuel shortage next winter. Hon. G. Howard Ferguson, Minister of Lands, Forests and Mines, announced that 1,000,000 cords of hardwood is available in a strip of land six miles wide along the railway running through Algonquin Park. He said the Government would give permission to the municipalities to cut the wood this coming summer, as one means of meeting the fuel shortage next win-

THE FEELING so far expressed amongst the quarterly boards of the Methodist church in Canada appears to be in favor of the extension of the pastoral term, some by one, others two, while a few favor a larger extension. The greatest obstacle comes from the rural sections, who apparently would rather see the plan reversed and the term shortened, their idea being no doubt based skidded and thundered along over the on the personal one of having a chance at the best that is going, which they fear would not be possible if the city congregations are allowed to hang on to the good men for terms longer than at present. Nothing is so fallacious as our estimate of how long we have been asleep. Usually when we wake, feeling quite rested, we were scarcely more than an hour or two naleep. If it is before midnight, it is probably
