Found Wanting

By Horace Stanhope

Reeves Darlow, lolling against a tree trunk a few feet beyond a high stone wall, his sketching outfit lying neglected at his side, uttered the ejaculation sharply and sat up.

Ills hand sought a certain spot on his forehead, with which suddenly, unexpectedly some flying object had come. in contact. The blow had been a sharp one, broke the skin and evidenced the possibility of a rising lump. He wondered what had struck him, and why. Then he recalled the sound of merry girlish voices beyond the wall. "Something thrown-of course not purposely," he sollloquized. "Ah! there's the missile—a stipper." As he arose he observed the object in question. It lay on the grass, white, smail, high-heeled, dainty. He turned it over and over in his hand, somewhat admiringly. Then he roused at the echo of a rustling sound. Where a portion of the wall was gone and there was a breach like a gateway, a graceful feminine figure had appeared. One foot was slipperless. Here was the owner of the innocent missile. About to advance and tender the slipper, Darlow was a good deal disappointed as its owner uttered a scream and, turning, fiashed back out of view like a nimble sprite. A great hubbub prose beyond the wall. "What scared you Norms-a bear?"

cried out an animated voice. "Worse than that." "A horrid man?" "A man, but not particularly horrid. Rather distinguished looking, I judge, from the fleeting glance I got. But oh i me limping on my stockinged foot Quick, Melba, grab the ball and let us vanish." There were mock exclamations of fright and dismay. Darlow reached the wall and waved the slipper over it. but, scurrying from the field, a group of half a dozen girls paid not the slightest attention, while with a shocked expression of face the denuded one, she who had lost the slipper, ran the fastest, her white silk-covered foot gleaming in and out of the gruss entirely fascinating in its nimbleness and gracefulness of form. "H'm!" observed Darlow, "she must last fall; sideboard; ball-bearing lawn have feotgear galore to disdain the return of the alipper. I see, a bevy of girls playing at football, a wild kick. and hence the alipper. And my bump! and Darlow ruefully rubbed the abraised spot. "As to the slipper, I'll -He threw the pretty satin-bowed

Reeves Darlow's way just now was the way of an idle stroller off on a hit-or-miss jaunt. He forgot about the slipper by morning. Its owner ceased to fill his thoughts before the close of the day following. Meantime, she of the lost slipper Norma Edgeworth, and her breathless associates cleared the field and settled down to rational progress. "It's a pity to leave that slipper behind. Norma." spoke one of her com-

"Oh, you know I'm bound with the morning for an environment where satin slippers and the like will be a negligible quantity."

"Surely you have got that foolish scheme of yours out of your head, "Never!" dissented Norma with vigor. "It isn't a scheme, it's a test." "And you are bound to go through with it?"

"Barring the possibility of some of | Volga. you chatterers betraying the fiction." "Oh, we'll be true blue, Norma'!" proclaimed an urgent chorus. All this would have been Greek to the unadvised. All would have been mystery for that same class, had they seen Norms Edgeworth twenty-four hours later. Whereas, she had borne the presentment of a fashionably dressed young lady and surrounded by companions suggesting the same order. the next day Norma was installed in an old-fashioned farmhouse ten miles distant, as pretty as ever, though arrayed in calleo, but engaging in active house-work, and seeming to enjoy it.

It was lining a hedge that marked the farm limit on one side that Reeves Darlow found himself two days after the incident of the slipper. Was it fate, or mefely natural and coincidental, that, glancing beyond it, he noted a . graceful girlish figure hanging some handkerchiefs on a line to dry. A quis-zical expression came into the face of this strolling artist as he discovered something else. The girl in view wore odd slippers. On one foot was a black slipper, and on the other one of white satin, the counterpart of the one resting within the sketching case he carried at that moment. "I declare!" communed Reeves with himself, a token of rare interest in the intonation. "I've found the mate of my Cinderella acquisition. There could be no doubt of it. He had caught only a momentury glimpse of Norma Edgeworth lack at the town meadow. She was now in calleo, whereas the maiden of the field had him and they walked to a bench under a great spreading oak. The appearance of a possible lover somewhat dampened the former exuberance of Reeves. Still, he was very much puzzled. The newcomer acted uneasy and embarrassed. The twain conversed for some time, then the girl arose. She removed a ring from her engagement tinger. She essayed a pitying look as he recounted his injury, she began to smile as he drolly dwelt upon the oddity of the incident, and then the ice was broken, and somehow he lingered for an hour, and again somehow he was a visitor to the farmhouse the next day.
