MOTHER

Mother is a little girl who trod my path before me;
Just a bigger, wiser little girl who ran ahead—
Bigger, wiser, stronger girl who always watches o'er me,
One who knows the pitfalls in the rugged road I tread.

Mother is a playmate who will always treat me kindly—
Playmate who will yield me what true happiness demands.
She will never let my feet stray into tumbles blindly—
Mother's just a bigger little girl who understands.

Mother is our older little playmate who'll befriend me—
Yesterday she traveled in the path that's mine today!
Never need I fear a foe from which she might defend me—
Faithful little pal who ran ahead and learned the way!

The Interference of Bess

By AGNES G. BROGAN

Billy frowned down into the bowl of his stubby pipe, while the girl watched him solicitously.

"But may be," she encouraged, "it is not as bad as you think."

"Bad!" exclaimed Billy wrathfully, "why where would I be, if dad married again? Do you think he would put me through college and start me out on my career, if he were interested in a new establishment of his own? No, indeedy, his second wife would take my place, and my coming wife's place, in the home. The thing to do, Bess, is to stop the affair in the bud. After a while it will be too late. Dad doesn't realise yet, that he's really in love with the girl."

"Perhaps," suggested Miss Blakeslee, "he isn't."

"Oh! No!" Billy sarcastically responded. "Then why does he spend every spare moment of his time in her company? Riding for hours with her in the park, glowering at a fellow if he interrupts a seance at the office. Dad was never like that with any of his other stenographers. And this one is a doll, you must admit that, Bess. You've seen her?"

Bess nodded her head. "When you pointed her out to me. I—I don't like her, Billy."

The boy smiled shrewdly. "Scheming looking?" he asked.

"That's what I thought."

"Dad has quite a bit of money. Some of it ought to come to me, but will it if he has a second wife? You know, Peaches, that you and I ... be married ... the thought of this actor's many troubled love affairs—brought Bess abruptly looking back to the purpose of her present visit, but how to start the subject tactfully.

"Billy," she began tentatively, "takes me much into his confidence. He is terribly anxious to get through college and begin the practice of medicine. He has so counted upon starting in his own home—your home," she paused lamely, then leaned forward with sudden confidence, "and he has been so worried for fear you may marry and spoil his career. But of course you would never do that, a man of your age must live his life. This is Billy's chance, Billy's time for success and joy, and love."

"Love" repeated the man quickly, "and you are my son's mediator! Can it be possible, then, that you are also interested in Billy's career?"

The hot blood rushed furiously to the girl's face, as she sat beneath his searching gaze. "I want Billy to be happy," she stammered.

"And I want to be happy," the man answered impatiently. "I do not agree with you that my life has been lived." Billy's father smiled a strangely wistful, pathetic sort of smile. "The past has been—none too happy," he said. "I am hoping that the best is yet to come. So I make no false promises. You may tell my son that from me, little Intercessor."

She looked back, vaguely troubled, as he bade her good afternoon, at the elevator door. Later, as Billy drove her home through the park, they came upon the big Powers' auto, stationary, near a wide sweep of meadow. Billy's father was in the front seat, and beside him the pretty stenographer. Bess glanced up sharply at Billy's muttered ejaculation, and she fancied the trace of a smile as his father's eyes met hers.

"Darn the luck!" cried the boy dejectedly, "if you couldn't make him see the folly of this thing, Peaches, somebody's got to talk to the girl."

"I don't," she told him.

"All right," answered Billy determinedly, "then I will."

Bess came upon the two not long after that in her favorite tea room. Billy's father was talking earnestly, rapidly, while the girl listened silently attentive. Bess seemed to immediately lose her appetite for luncheon—it was all so hopeless for Billy. And presently, when the little stenographer had smilingly left him, Mr. Powers came over to her table.

"Well," he asked pleasantly, "how are affairs and Billy?" And when he offered to drive her home Bess decided to accept, and taking advantage of the time, to make a final plea. But Billy's father proved such an agreeable companion that she abandoned her plan on the way, and gave herself up to the enjoyment of the hour. After all it was hard that a man so congenial and kind must spend his days alone in a great vacant house. Of course there would be Billy, and later, Billy's wife, but the more Bess thought about it—well, strange to say, the more her heart ached for the father.

Billy, too, grew morbid — distraught. She couldn't quite make him out. For hours he would sit puffing away on that ill-smelling pipe, only to jump up suddenly and rush away. She supposed he was ...

Popular English Habit From Which Came Wealth Of Sir Thomas Lipton

SIR THOMAS LIPTON is known throughout the world for his plucky and persistent effort to lift the American Cup. There can be no doubt about him being a good sport. He has also done good work since the beginning of the war by giving his yacht and assisting in the financing of Serbian relief. But when all is said and done, Sir Thomas Lipton's name has become known chiefly through that great British institution, the Five o'Clock Tea. When it comes down to a fine point, tea is the national beverage of the English people.

For many years "tea time" in England has meant one of the most cheerful and welcome meetings of the day. Everyone seems to unbend and wax convivial over this time-honored institution. Truly it is the "cup that cheers." "Afternoon tea" is the fashionable function at which all that society beloved by ladies is retailed at breakneck speed and when judgment on one's acquaintances is delivered over the delicate cups of still more delicate tea. "Five o'clock tea" is the good old-fashioned meal at which prodigious quantities of plum cake, bread and butter and jam are consumed with good, honest cups of the steaming beverage.

The London city clerk would not think of missing his "tea," although he is not able to get home for it as a rule. Perhaps it is for that reason so many "tea shops" thrive in the main thoroughfares of the city itself. These "tea rooms" are very spacious and generally decorated with marble and glass in profusion. Small individual tables are set in rows and the waitresses that take one's order are an institution in themselves among the clerks.

A very well made cup of tea can be had in these establishments for 2d. (or four cents) with all the surroundings of a good restaurant. Etceteras, such as bread and butter and a great variety of cakes, can be had proportionately cheaply.

One often thinks there should be a small fortune for anyone who would venture into the "shilling tea" business in this country. In England it is evidence throughout the county. A "shilling tea" is the fitting climax of a long country trudge on a fine afternoon (generally Sunday). In explanation let it be said that the Londoner delights in getting out of London on a Sunday, and special excursions are run all the year round to rural spots twenty or thirty miles outside the city, on that day. Guide books are issued in great profusion by the advertising departments of the railway companies and one always arranges to make the climax of the walk a visit to one of the delightful creeper-covered inns or quaint wayside houses, where one may rest in quaint old-word gardens or in aged parlors and enjoy the "shilling tea" to repletion. Tea, bread and butter, watercress, lettuce, fresh eggs, jam and cake are all included in the bill of fare, while for an extra sixpence a large bunch of old-world flowers may often be purchased as a souvenir to take home. Surely such a scheme would ... response
