WHAT IS TO COME

(William Earnest Henley)

What is to come we know not. But we know

That what has been was good—was good to show.

Before to hide, and best of all to bear.

We are the masters of the days that were,

We have lived, we have loved, we have suffered.

Let us not take the path which leads to the life was our friend. Now, if it be our foe—

Dear, though it spoil and break

us—need we care

What is to come?

Let the great winds (their spirit and wildest blow

Or the gold weather round us mellow slow

We have fulfilled ourselves and our day

And we can conquer, though we may not shine

In the rich quiet of the afterglow

What is to come?

Propinquity's Part

By DOROTHEA DOUGLAS

(Copyright, 1918, by McClure Newspaper Syndicate)

"Oh, yes, I shall be brave!" Her tone was light. Her heart held tears.

"I shall wait for you—always," she said, and all the gay and brilliant as if it played about happy lips.

"But—of course you will, girl!

You're that kind of stuff. And I'll come back to you with a chest full of medals and arms full of love." Her head drooped on his khaki shoulder for a moment while she almost gave way.

"Good-by," she whispered and pushed him from her.

He held her for one more moment.

"Good-by, my girl," he said, swallowing the lump that almost choked him.

Then he took his cap and strode down the garden path, closed the gate behind him and was lost to her among the shadows of the trees.

June twisted her handkerchief to a hard knot, bit her lips and kept her eyes fixed to the opening in the trees where she had last seen him. Then, slowly, she let the tears flow down her cheeks, threw herself into the hammock and sobbed.

Capt. Teddy Blake was soon back in his quarters with the knowledge in his own heart that this was the last time he would see June for many a day. That he would sail on the following day or the next at the latest was sure. It seemed very hard to leave June; they had been so happy; she was wonderfully lovely. But—she would come back and claim her some day. That she would not wait for him, that he could forget—those were impossible suggestions.

June answered the call of the Red Cross for nurses. She felt in her first dejection and loneliness as if she must do something to help hasten the end of the war that separated her from him. She was accepted and went into a hospital for training almost at once.

She became absorbed in the work, met many new and interesting persons and soon found herself quite cheerful and again. At night when she wrote her letter to Captain Teddy she told him of her work, of the new faces, of her ambition to get "over there" and help and perhaps take care of him. But she did not weep; rather she grew more and more proud of having sent her captain off so bravely, and congratulated herself for her own cheerfulness.

"You're going to make a wonderful nurse, Miss Prince," one of the doctors told her after she had helped him in some surgical dressing.

"Oh, yes, I!" she exclaimed. "I love the work."

Doctor Buchanan watched the wonderful color flush her face at the compliment she had said her. He was the cleverest surgeon as Doctor Buchanhan. Also she now had the tender to smile at him when she passed him in the corridors or he chanced upon her in the wards. Hereafter she had never noticed any of the doctors, some one having told her it was better to attend strictly to the professional side of the work and not permit herself to know the doctors socially.

Captain Teddy's letters were filed with interesting stories of jaunts here and there, when he had time to himself. He spoke more than once of the slavery with which he was picking up the French language. A pretty French girl, Jeanne de Noyser, whom he had met at a canteen, was giving him lessons on every available occasion. Oh, he would come back to June quite an accomplished French student, and he hoped she was not being too lonely.

The war dragged on and June finished her training, grew even more slightly with which he was picking up
