LOOKED LIKE SEA CAPTAIN

English Writers Did Not Have
"Literary" Appearance.

William Morris, Arthur Compton-Bickett says "is not the only victorian man of letters whom the casual passer-by might have mistaken for a sea captain. There was the look of the sea captain also about Dickens and, to a lesser extent, about Robert Browning; Dickens had made a jaun-tier sea captain, with his love of bright colors; and Browning, with his dapper ways, a sprucer one. All these men were both dreamers and men of action; artists and men of the world. It needed all Dickens' simple homeliness and vivid sense of actuality to curb and restrain the fantastic extravagance of his dream self. As it is, his riotous imagination often broke bounds; and from one point of view, 'The Christmas Carol' is an Utopian as 'The Dream of John Ball'."

Browning's "liking for social functions" and his "southern tastes, his intellectual subtleties, found no counterpart in Morris. Yet in the elemental vigor and passion of the man, the fine audacity, the hearty love of the earth, the contempt for the trifler and mere dilettante, the two men had no little in common.

"Had it been possible to put Morris, Dickens, and Browning on the Underground Railway, and after ward to have compared their impressions, interesting variation of comment would have resulted. Dickens could have told us of the crowd of passengers and differentiated each one with his wonderful eye for external peculiarities. Browning would have found some psychological drama to his hand; and Morris, after declaiming on the hideousness of it all, would have seemed the most keenly alive to the minutest points of railway organisation, which, always interested him.

"Veins of likeness and unlikeness to one another, cross and recross with startling vividness the personalities of these three great Victorians. In unlikeness assuredly, for each was a man of highly distinctive and assertive individuality; but in likeness also, for each was a blend of contradictory selves, each enjoyed taking the middle-class Englishman by the scruff of the neck and shaking him with the best will in the world.
Belonging to the middle class themselves, they knew all the family peculiarities, and the fact that none of them ever freed himself entirely of the conventions of his class, merely serves as another bond in common.

"Morris was a shrewd observer in his own special way, though he gave the opposite impression to the casual onlooker. He never seemed to be on the watch, yet little escaped him.
Without any apparent effort of observation, he would come into a room and take in all the people there, their appearance and characteristics, with swift insight and acumen."

Not Easily Recalled.

One afternoon an esteemed citizen went out to the country club for a turn around the golf links, and after making several rather weird plays he turned to the imperturbable caddy.

"I suppose," said he, "that in caddying around here you have seen worse golf players than I am."

The boy did not answer. With a fixed gaze he seemed to be looking into the distance.

"I said," remarked the golfer in a much louder tone, "that I suppose you have seen worse players than I."

"I heard what ye said the first time, mister," was the startling responder of the caddy; "but you've got to give a feller time to think."

What Tommy Would Say.

One day when small Tommy was called to the desk with his slate he accidentally stepped on his teacher's foot. She looked up, expecting a "Please pardon me," but Master Tommy was silent.

"Why, Tommy, what should you say," she asked.

Tommy hung his little head.

"What should you say, dear?"

Tommy began to cry.

"What should you say, Tommy?"

persisted his teacher.

"I s-should s-say puch," sobbed Tommy.
