Ballinalad

(Late for last issue)

Rev. Mr. Jewitt is continuing his special services this week.

Mr. H. Barth Terra Cotta, happened with a painful accident last Thursday. When trying to get his car out of a rut, he ran into the stone fence in front of Miss Short-till's house, damaging his car and breaking his knee cap. He was taken to Guelph Hospital, where he is getting along nicely.

A member from here attended the Guelph District meeting and the annual District Epworth League Convention held in Regent last Tuesday.

Mr. E. Hendry has moved to Wentworth.

The Misses McEwen's entertained a number of their friends at a social dance last Wednesday evening.

The proposition of one American scientist is to try salting the clouds, from aeroplanes in order to produce rain. Care should be taken, however, that the aviators don't use rock salt.

As a Man Striveth

By HARRY F. BOWLING

(Copyright.)

"I wonder what finally became of Adrian Hope?"

Isabelle spoke listlessly; there was nothing in her voice; her tone was negative.

"Poor Adrian! he was one of the best. Nothing ever happened of such importance as 'the strange case' of his."

"I filled back my bankbook and smiled indulgently at Isabelle. We had been celebrating the fifth anniversary of our wedding day. We were on the terrace of our Monterey villa, we were enjoying the restful hour of twilight."

"A delicious amourette was stealing over me, the issue of an easy conscience and a good digestion.
Isabelle looked me from my dreaming, there was a momentary flash of her voice out of keeping with her former apathy.

"Tell me, Maribus, is it a divine or only a human law, that no one woman at one time may make more than one man happy?"

"Sounds like a problem in geometry or an algebraic equation. Send it to the puzzle department. I attended lately."

She said no attention to me but continued in the same strain.

"I would never be the cause of surfacing any man—especially for I have been so, it was through an inexorable law."

"Oh, as to Adrian Hope," I remarked lightly, tracing her thought to its source, "it was part of his misfortune. You couldn't help it."

"Yet he was in earnest."
"You much in earnest for other people's comfort? He and his little because a neighborhood nuisance; he had no more sense in him than a—a humbug!"

"Humbugges are rather tedious," she retorted. "And I think you hardly do justice to Adrian Hope."
"What! Did you enjoy his music?"

"No, but he tried so hard. I was sorry for him, and it worries me sometimes."

"Worries you?" I was growing a little impatient. "What worries you?"

"Adrian Hope left California the very day of our marriage and has never been heard of since."

"He went to the East Indies. I have told you many times—especially for business, partly for pleasure."

"And wholly for pain. My dear Maribus," she continued quickly. "Can I help remembering he was desperately in love with me, and I could never reciprocate his feelings, and he went away broken-hearted, do you call that going for pleasure, and are you jealous because I feel sorry for him?"

"I am not jealous," I answered quietly. "Why should I be? Adrian never had the ghost of a show." Isabelle looked her elbow on the stone balustrade which separated the terrace from the garden below, and rested her chin in her open palm.

"The 'Greatest of Reflection'—what a parody! If I could put you on canvas, just as you look now!" I murmured.
She shook her head and smiled sadly.

"You abandoned your brush and palette long ago, Maribus. I'm afraid you couldn't do it."

Her last remark caused me some pin-pricks of conscience. Since, just one year after our marriage Isabelle had inherited a comfortable competence. I had entirely neglected my studio in which I had formerly had no only for a living, but my art had been art for art's sake.

"Oh, well, it's never too late to mend," I hinted. "You see fate sometimes seems to point in our direction and then she supports us."
"But fate and the unexpected are twin brothers," a deep voice broke in with the boom of an ocean breaker.

I jumped to my feet. Adrian Hope was standing only a few feet from me. I had heard no sound of his approach.

As I stepped forward to greet Adrian Hope retreated into the shadow of the porch.

"I have been away a long time, haven't I?" Adrian began apologetically. "I must say your return hasn't startled you. It's hardly conventional, I fear."

Adrian shook my hand heartily, but seemed utterly oblivious of my wife's presence.

"Your present life, Maribus," he asked, presently, "is it happy, as men call it?"

"Perfectly happy," I assented. "Isabelle will tell you."

"Ah, yes! and five years ago I imagined myself perfectly unhappy." Isabelle stepped forward into the moonlight, and I saw that her cheeks were crimson. Adrian addressed himself to me:

"Come, talk to me of perfect happiness, as much as you. You used to be a good talker, as talk goes."

He smiled and wrinkled only one corner of his mouth. His face in the moonlight was the color of dead moss.
I paid no heed to his sneering remark.
After a prolonged silence he began again.

"I thought once that it was my failure to produce results that put me out of court with Isabelle. She spent many hours in your studio, attempting your pictures, while my music fell on deaf ears."

"For you could paint, while my failing, I must confess, was atrocious.
Isabelle was always an idealist. Five years ago you accepted the pedestal.
How do matters stand now?"

"In the presence of my wife, such remarks are hardly in good taste," I said, inwardly boiling.

He drummed the ground with his foot and hummed a little tune.

"By the by, you fulfilled the promise you then made? Have you become —the great artist?"

"When I started I found something better in life."

"You mean something easier. You thought you could rest on your laurels.
How do you suppose I spent the last five years, I who had no laurels to rest on?"

"I understood you had gone to New

Guinea.

"Did you ever hear the purpose?"
"No, it was a queer piece to go to, whatever the reason."

"In every way I had been a failure," he declared impressively. "I was resolved to turn that failure into triumph."

"To accomplish which you buried yourself in a New Guinea swamp?"
"Yes, I went to the only real toehold nature herself. Among the deep marshes and bogs—brakes of a reeking tropical swamp I sought for the weary toehold, perhaps of dirt, vegetation and disease, still from among the scree of rubbish had selected one perfect rock."

"Look at it, Maribus—examine it—blow through it. How it represents the five years of life which you have consumed in idleness."

"Willing to humor him, I picked it up. It seemed almost to vibrate in my fingers. Blowing into it produced no sound, but a queer sensation passed over me; it was as though I were a piece of state apparatus which had been all over with crumpled paper."

"I haven't the knack of it," I said, dropping it to the ground like a rejected coal.

"The rock gave forth a musical sigh as it struck the stones; Adrian caught it on the rounded and turned suddenly to Isabelle.

"Would you care to hear my one little accomplishment after five years of the cruelest concentration?" Isabelle nodded eagerly, but in a frightened manner; her hands were clenched tightly against the treads of the bonnycoys, as though she were bracing herself for an ordeal.

I began to laugh nervously. Whereupon Adrian wheeled sharply on his heels. Blowing into it produced no sound, but a queer sensation passed
over me; it was as though I were a piece of state apparatus which had been all over with crumpled paper."

"I haven't the knack of it," I said,
