OUR MISSION

If you cannot on the ocean sail among the swiftest fleet, Rocking on the highest billows, laughing at the storms you meet, You can stand among the sailors, anchored yet within the bay: You can lend a hand to help them as they launch the boats away. If you are, you weak to journey, slip the mountain steep and high, You can stand among the sailors, while the multitudes go by, You can stand in happy measure as they slowly pass about: Though they may forget the strain, or they will not forget the gain.

If you cannot in the conflict prove yourself a soldier brave, If there fits and smoke are thick, set there a no work for you to do.

When the battlefield is silent, you can stand among the sailors, you can stand among the sailors, you can cover up the dead, Do not stand by idly watching for some greater work to do, Fortune is a lazy goddess—she will never come to you, Go and toil in any vinyard, do not fear to do or doer, set there a no work for you to do.

If you want a field of labor, you can find it anywhere.

Need for More Consuls.
The chairman of the shipping board has called the attention of congress and the people to the need of enlarging our consular service abroad, in view of the fact that our great merchant marine will be needed for use in foreign trade.

Mr. Hurley tells us, observes the independent (New York), that the United States will be 25,000,000 tons of merchant shipping by the end of 1920, and that as fast as these ships can be freed from military work they will enter commerce. The present consulates would be entirely inadequate to handle this enlarged business. There are not enough of them, their staffs are too small and they are handicapped by inexperienced consuls who will be demanded and by antiquated regulations. Even now the burden of work, especially in the way of inquiries to be answered, is overtaxing the untrained and underpaid force. Mr. Hurley therefore pleads that immediate steps be taken to remedy the situation.

"We need more consuls and larger consular staffs," he tells us, "if we do not provide them today and prepare for the great growth in our merchant marine and trade after the war, I fear that we shall suffer a serious breakdown."

W've Heard 'Em.
"Look here," said the city editor to the cub reporter, "you should write everything as briefly as possible. Instead of saying 'the middle-aged bald-headed performer in the bird aggregation of followers of Orpheus who slightly provide the harmony at one of our leading temples of mirth, seized his trombone firmly in his hands, placed his feet on a stool, and then placed and sounded thereon an unearthly tone like the wailing of a lost soul on the main street of Inferno—now shorten that up.'"

"So the reporter merely wrote: 'The alp horn player in the orchestra blew a helva note.'"

He Did.
One of the Indianapolis grade schools recently organized a company of cadets. A high school cadet was obtained to train them, but the principal of the grade school was a bit uneasy over the way her boys might treat him. "You have to impress them in a dignified way," she advised him, when he came to the building. "Make them think you're a person of importance and then they'll mind you."

The seventeen-year-old cadet nodded. He went on into the assembly room, faced the boys and explained his position. "Fellows," he began, "my name's Jones. Captain Jones. Now salute me."

"They did. So did the principal, mentally."

A Layer of Tin.
At my friend's wedding everything had gone off fine. The ceremony was over and the bride was about to cut the wedding cake. The bride went halfway down the cake and stopped, the table rocked dangerously, and everyone wondered what the trouble was. "The bride cut the bottom of a cake tin from the center of the cake. All the bride did was to tell the guests that 'revenge' is sweet."

NO DISGRACE TO FEEL FEAR

One Result of War Has Been Sane Ideas of What Conquittes Real Bravery.

An English observer calls attention to the fact that our world war has destroyed the fear of being afraid. Heretofore, even in most of the world, the only quality looked up in the soldier was that he should be fearless. The hero of the day was the better. The faintest tremor of timidity was a black mark against the most resplendent knight as well as the lowliest boyman or husband, and the schooling for war was an utter disregard of the personal risk.

This theory held, in many will remember, even till the period of the Boer war, when the British suffered so severely in officers, because it was held cowardly for a commander to seek cover. Men, then as now, felt fear for the cause of their duty, but not, indeed, in one of the most valuable of human possessions, since fear is our protection from danger and hence innumerable. We fear will be to "avoid them, snakes and spiders to increase our attention, storms and tempests that we may preserve means of escape from them.

So it was only in battle that timidity insisted that man should be without fear, or pretend to be.

With the coming of new warfare, however, all ideas at once came to a more sane understanding and the old physical bravery has given place to moral resolution. The man who now enters the hell of shell fire of hurried battles and death, that no longer attempts to fool himself into the belief that he is not afraid. He knows full well and only a stupid nature could deny the fact that the human is at the mercy of forces a million times beyond his own ability to counter. The old knight might really believe he was able to outthrust all the enemies that rode against him and therefore might conceivably be without fear, but how can a soldier feel that way when facing modern weapons of destruction?

Therefore, it is no longer a disgrace to feel fear or to admit it; the only disgrace is to allow fear to prevent one doing his duty. How much fiercer fear is needed for this new defence!

Salvor Values Charm.
The king and queen recently received at Windsor castle the Australian, New Zealand and South African press delegates now on a visit to Great Britain. His majesty spoke warmly of the gallantry of the Dominions troops, and exchanged reflections on his visit to the island of 1901. When Mr. Prant of New Zealand mentioned the name of Magpie Pankura, the Maori guide who conducted the king round the hot springs, understood of Retorua, the king recalled her at once, and was interested to learn that she is now in England. The New Zealand delegates and that Princess Mary heard all about the pro-war Maori prophecy concerning the battle-craze New Zealand—that she would go into action within a given number of years and would be hit but escape serious damage if her captain wore a Maori tiki (greenstone charm). The first part of the prophecy came true, and so up to date has the second. The captain does not forget to wear his tiki.

Passed by Sentry.
A colonel of a colored regiment coming in about 10:30 was duly challenged by the sentry, and responded: "Colonel—, officer of the camp." The sentry tried his best to pierce the darkness, gave it up, and finally said: "Look 'eah, man, you-all ah de folk man what's done tried to make me think he's a Cornell—, Go away wid dat stuff!"

The colonel pretty warmly reprimanded that he was Colonel—, and demanded immediate admission. The guard, unshaken, told him to step up where he could see him. The colonel walked up to him in a rage, and you can imagine his consternation when the sentry took hold of the silver eagle on his shoulder, looked up at him with a grin on his face and said: "Oh, Lawdy! 'Tis de ole bird, ain't it?"—The Bayonet.

"Flop" Marketing.
Marie, who was three Thausigling, was out trying her new mask. Passing a grocery, she decided to buy some bananas. Mother, who had worn her "flop" protector, sent Marie to make the purchase. Mother saw the grocer pulling off tons of bananas, it seemed. At length, when there was nothing left but the stalks, Marie handed the grocer her little pocketbook containing one solitary dime. "How many bananas did your little girl want?" asked the grocer as he came to the door. "Two cents' worth," replied Marie. "She told me she wanted a peck," said the grocer.

American Oil.
A famous British statesman, Lord Curzon, declared that the allies "ought to victory on a sea of oil." He might have said "on a sea of American oil." No less than four-fifths of the petroleum products used by the allies were furnished by America. At one time, before the shipping of American oil was properly organized, the armies in France had on hand less than one month's supply, forcing the general staff to make calculations of how they must retreat in case of a breakdown in the supply of gasoline. America, however, came heroically to the rescue and saved the day. Chief credit for our titanic achievements in keeping the allied armies and armies going with oil was officially given A. C. Bedford, chairman of the petroleum war service committee of the United States fuel administration, by representatives of both the British and French governments on the occasion of the presentation to Mr. Bedford of the cross of the French Legion of Honor. The occasion was historic in that it brought together in a harmonious way all the independent oil representatives and the Standard Oil group; a feat which would have been impossible before the common danger led the necessity for common action.—Petroleum Magazine.

HAD GOOD POINTS

Hot-Tempered Woman Evidently Not Altogether Bad.

Surely No High-Priced Lawyer Could Make Surpassable Pathetic Plea of Husband Which Was Her Own Liberty.

There was a negro family living in Bowling Green, Ky. The wife had a notoriously unmanageable temper, usually taking it out on her husband, who was most unobtrusively on the occasion she struck him with a skillet, inflicting a wound to the skull and demanding to be hospitalized for her husband's sake. The neighbors, knowing the violent temper of the wife, and the cruel treatment she had inflicted upon her husband for such a long time, were so outraged they could tolerate it no longer, and procured a warrant for her arrest on the charge of assault with a deadly weapon.

"The husband sat through the trial, giving rapt attention to its every detail. The case was handed over to the jury and after very brief deliberation it brought in a verdict of guilty. The old darkey husband rose and said:

"Marse Judge, I don't reckon nothing a nigger could say would make much difference, but I would like to say a word before you send the 'old woman' to the penitentiary. She's always been a good mother to the children, all the neighbors will tell you that, and she mends for 'em, and keeps 'em clean and nice, an when they're sick she sits up with 'em at night. And, Marse Judge, I just want to say you if you won't let her go by the house and see the children before you send her to the penitentiary. They's at home all alone 'right now, cryin' they go little, and the ole 'man, too, if he could just go out and kiss 'em good-by before she was put in the penitentiary."

By this time the judge and the spectators were in tears and the judge said: "Gentlemen of the jury, I haven't passed sentence yet and if you wait a few minutes to further consider this case, I will be glad to grant it." The jury retired and in a few minutes returned with a verdict of "not guilty."
