What Could You Expect?

By DORA MOLLAN

It occurred to Potter Lamb, as he rearranged his brand-new furniture, that one more chair, making four instead of three, would bridge the chasm between penny and prosperity in the aspect of his law office.

Putting the telephone receiver to his ear, with the number of the town's one-furniture equipment on the tip of his tongue, the fledgling attorney heard a shrill voice ejaculate: "What can you expect of a girl who has named after a pocket handkerchief?"

"What you didn't know?" "Yes, her mother picked it up at an auction—had belonged to a German countess," she said. "The name was embroidered on it—and she went and washed it in the tub. Ever since then, she has been like to know what sort of thing it could be that you should expect of a girl who had been named after a pocket handkerchief?"

The clock in the town hall struck twelve. The expansive grin that had spread over Lamb's countenance during his rambling faded. It wouldn't do to be late to one of Mrs. Noyes' excellent dinners.

He glanced at the receiver. This time the time was clear. He placed the order for the chair, seized his hat and rushed off to Mrs. Noyes, girls and handkerchiefs quite forgotten.

Potter Lamb sat at the desk in the afternoon fitting the new chair into the equipment of the office. Then, when he had exhausted all possible combinations, and stood by the corner each time to "see how the effect looked," as the old lady said, and had finally decided upon one of the arrangements from improvement, there was nothing left to do but sit down and await the coming of clients. He prayed that they might come soon; he had his living to get. Living! What an indefinite word! It might mean anything from a butter-sized establishment and a steam yacht to carrots the neighbors brought in. The briefcase formerly stood a long time at the window watching the trickle of traffic in the street below and rolling innumerable cigarettes.

At dusk the happy thought came that a brief walk before supper might add even more zest to his enjoyment of Mrs. Noyes' culinary achievements. He took his hat down—then hung it up again and stared himself down at his desk where a book of Ohio reports lay open.

There were steps on the stairway. Came a tap at his door. Potter Lamb opened it and a girl walked in. Momentarily she gazed about the room with a frank show of curiosity. Meantime, also, the lawyer gazed at his caller. His first client!

A slim young girl, garbed in blue serge with a gray ram perched at a fetching angle. With a calm self-possession she flashed scrutiny of the room and turned her eyes upon him. They were unusually blue eyes, Potter thought.

"You are Attorney Lamb?"

"Guiltily admitted Potter. Just the least flustered; and it was not every girl who could upset Mr. Lamb's lawyerly pose, even a mere trifle.

"I have $2,000 here," the girl said, getting a bag, "and I wish to put it in your hands to do with as I direct."

"I shall be most happy," said Lamb, and there was inquiry in his eyes.

"You have been in law two days; so you have probably heard how I acquired it."

The young man shook his head.

"Can it be possible? Well, I'll tell you. It's a story of promise many."

"You—that is—do I understand?"

Potter, to whom this information had come from this extremely interesting girl like a shrapnel shell out of a Christmas cornucopia, was frowning.

"Exactly. I deliberately snared an honored and wealthy citizen of the town into proposing marriage to me—not it is written. Then, with malice aforethought I snared him off—and brought a girl that netted me this."

STORY OF TURTLE CREATION

Australian Blacks Have Romantic Yarn About Origin of Reptile.

The Australian blacks have a prettier, more romantic story about the creation of the turtle than that they were just one of the many things God put upon the earth. They say that Willie Wayambah, an Australian tribesman, was roaming the bush, he came across Oolah, the Lizard-woman, with three children, digging for yams. He stole her and the children and took them to his camp. The other members of the tribe were angry with him, because they had saved a young girl for him to marry, and told him they would not help him fight Oolah's tribe, when it came to get her back.

When the savage tribe came to do battle Wayambah went out to meet them, wearing a shield in front and behind him. When his enemies shot at him he drew his head and limbs in between the shields. He did this three times, then he realized the enemy was upon him and his only escape was in the river. He threw one shield away and jumped in. They waited on the bank for him to reappear, ready to shoot him as soon as his head came above water. To avoid them he turned himself into a turtle, the tribesmen say, and he is in the water to this day, with his shield on his back. When anyone comes to have him he draws his head and limbs under his shield.
