A MAN'S JOB

It's a man's job to be cheerful. In the face of grief and care. Any working can be careful. And a victim of despair. But it takes a man to swallow All the bitter in the cup. And to live for what may follow. Without ever giving up.

It's a man's job to be kindly. It's a man's job to be brave. None can shut his eyes and blindly try to ignore his life through. And not see the wrong about him. Or the hazards in his way. There are times when fate will flout him. And his feet will go astray.

Not in fools and craven creatures. Are the worthy virtues found. Not on blank and lifeless features. Do the cheerful smiles abound. He who to his best is livelier. And for truth and honor stands. And is cheerful in his giving. Has a man's job on his hands.

To be kind and thoughtful ever. To put all your best endeavor In an effort to succeed. And to fail and keep on trying. And not lose your cheerful ways. In a job, there's no denying. For a real man, nowadays.

SEVENTY-FIVE AND BOARD

By M. P. MERRYMAN

In 1918, by Major Newman, Esq., M.P.

Follow October's sunlight, poured through the west window of the library. Myriad dust particles danced along the slanting sun-paths that slid abruptly into shadow at the table's edge. The assistant professor of biology sat hunched over a book that lay upon the table before him, but he was not concentrating, at least not upon the text. With a glance of his eye that said the book jumping he raised his head and looked about the big quiet room.

The assistant professor, tall, of his glasses and ruffled hair, sat and stretched. They had shined his hands into his pockets, tilted back in his chair and surveyed the shelves of dog-eared volumes opposite him. It gave him an immense satisfaction, this bare, low-ceilinged room with its brown walls and wild, brown tables and its rows and rows of books.

The assistant professor pulled out a crumpled bit of paper from his pocket and smoothed it out upon the book, after which he continued to regard it with appraising eyes. It was a check made out to him for the amount of twelve dollars and fifty cents; a sum he had received in payment of a recent article which he had written for the magazine. It was a good article, too, but according to more than one editor "not sufficiently popular in tone."

He had been trying to make a decision. This last contemplation of the scrap of paper in his hand had served to topple the scales. He closed the book with a bang, crossed his long legs from the table and walked down the aisle to the door, outside he stood for an instant blinking in the strong light. When he closed his eyes they acted like a pair of book pages. With something of the feeling of a stranger he turned and walked along the leaf-strewn path to the lake. Now that there was no longer any doubt about his departure the minute landscape seemed all at once unfamiliar and different. He felt already detached from it—and sorry.

The moment the tip of her canoe veered round a bend in the shore line he recognized it and whistled. The assistant professor, English while he had been, now waved an ungrateful paddle in greeting as her small craft slipped into sight.

"Want to come?" she called, invitingly.

"Sure!"

"All right! 'Clab in!"

The canoe nosed landward and dashed into the shore. With a lunge which shot the boat into deeper water and himself miraculously into the boat, the new passenger embarked and took charge of the paddle.

"Where do you want to go on it?"

"Oh, anywhere," she replied and smiled at him.

He selected the most distant spot on the lake, laid the paddle across the gunwale and cast his eyes on it.

"Takes longer this way," he explained.

She laughed and leaned sideways to swallow. The red nose between the two wot scudding along the surface of the water like a fleet of toy millabouts. The red of her tam-o-shanter, however, had more fascination for her than the leaves whirled out of sight and she settled back in her seat to feast her eyes upon lake and trees and sky.

"You're not like all the folks who live in cities," she said.

She looked up inquiringly at the question. He had said it out so abruptly it had a little. He had begun paddling, too, furiously.

"Why?" she repeated. "Why, because they miss all this!" She waved her hand toward the rustling woods that shadowed them. "Wouldn't you hate to miss it?" she queried. The blade in his hand cut a long swathe before he answered.

"I expect to miss it—after next Sunday," he said.

"You—you mean?" Her question hung unheeded.

"Yes, I'm going to the city."

She said it with a pucker of his mouth as if even the taste of the words was bitter to him.

"Oh!" She bit her lips and tried to go on, quickly he asked, but her brain appeared to be turning a somersault—and no words came.

"Yes," he went on dully. "I'm going away. Decker has a fellow who gives me these last two days till college opens to decide. Well, I've made up my mind. I'm going to the city to live in a hall bedroom and work in an office—and sell rubber. I'll loathe selling rubber, but I've got to stick to it till I can make a decent enough living to ask a decent girl in marry me. It's either way here and go on with my work than anything else on earth, but I'll be hanged if I'll see my wife to wear second-hand clothes all her life or wear 'em myself. The digging along forever on seventy-five a month and board is getting my goat. Today this came. It was the last straw." He drew his offending check from his pocket and flipped it into her lap. She read it and met his eyes when she had finished. "I don't know that I blame you much," she said.

They skidded along for a time.

each waiting for the other to speak. When she had made up her mind that he never expected to open his mouth again, she gave in. "And—and how does the girl—how about it?" she inquired. "That would make—some difference—of course." Hours passed for her before he replied.

"I haven't—asked her—yet," he said hesitatingly.

With a little shiver of relief she sank back in her seat and caught back the smile in her eyes so that he might not see it. He went on elaborating, making it unreasonably, as it is, to want enough to live on decently? I'm not expecting to plunders' wages, you know, or anything like that; but hang it, every teacher's got to live."

She began speaking then and her voice grew softer and fuller as she went on. "I know," she replied. "It's unfair said, it probably will be for a long time to come, but you can't have everything, you know. You have the wages you like best to all the world. And many men can't do that."

"I know all that," he said, shaking his head in reply. "I've talked that way to myself, too, but all the same I've made up my mind to try for $50 a month."

"So you have been house hunting?"

He had not even the grace to blush. "None," he exclaimed. "Why shouldn't I? Even a poor devil of a pedagogue can look 'em up."

She leaned forward, her eyes dancing, but for the moment she felt a little like his mother, nevertheless.

"Hoy," she explained slowly and emphatically, "when you're a school-teacher you don't rent a steam-heated apartment in town; you get cottage in the country and buy a good second-hand stove. For that matter, all the furniture is second-hand but you needn't look like that—it's nice. You buy a few pieces at a time and put on three coats of paint and then you enamel it and if you want to you paint little flow—"

"He could not wait for her to finish. "And for an engagement ring, he jeered. "You buy some pretty little thing at the five and ten."

She shook her head defiantly till the red nose bobbed. "No, you don't! You hunt up that lovely old amethyst ring of your mother's that you once showed to—the to the."

He was still stubborn and unconvincing. "And then," he demanded, "when the house is rented and furnished and—and everything—who pays the bills?"

Her patience reached its limit. "Can't you figure out anything for yourself?" she demanded angrily. "None land goes with the cottage, of course; enough to raise the rent. I'll trust for the family, and besides that you do whatever you can. Raise chickens or rabbits or bees or thoroughbred dogs or mushrooms or anything that sells—how about it? Honestly, I've made several hundred dollars writing 'detective' stories. Maybe your writing 'em could do something like that—after the dates."

The assistant professor of biology began to believe he had died and gone to heaven. He felt as if he were treading on balloons that bore him higher and higher, yet strangely did not break. The prospect of remaining at his work made him giddy enough, but added to that the idea of wife and home was still beyond his rapidly expanding imagination.

"Do you—do you suppose—it could be done?" he demanded, and tried to swallow. The red nose between the two wot-shanter was quivering, but the round little chin was firm. "Of course it could!" she said.

"God!" murmured the assistant professor of biology fervently. "I almost believe it could, too! And you don't believe I'd be a low-down cad for asking the best little girl in the school to marry me and live like that? His hands moved forward, eagerly awaiting the touch of the two steady ones that slipped into his own, while the paddle, unheeded, slid into the water and floated away.

"I'm sure you wouldn't," she answered. "If—if you mean—"

Memo After Death in Family.

(Or the inherited rover spirit of the wild people of Davos and their belief that the death of a member of the family is indicative of the will of Allah for them to change their homes, the bureau of forestry says:—

"When someone dies in the house built on the land or homestead given to the head of a family, the entire family will move to some other place and in most cases the house is either burned or torn down and the land on which it was built is abandoned for some years. A wild bird of the pigeon family, locally known as stumpcock, is the common god or fortune teller of the wild people of Davos. Unless this bird answers favorably to their supplications to go back to the old place, their old abode or abodes are either forever abandoned or left untouched for many years."

Children at Play.

You have but to go abroad for half an hour in pleasant weather, or to throw open your doors and windows on a Saturday afternoon, to see the youngsters in the neighborhood of a school house, or a vacant lot with here and there a patch of green or a dry place on it, and avoid the curtains or draw the blinds and let the fresh winds blow through and through the members of your heart for a few minutes, inhaling the dust and entering the cobwebs that have gathered there while you were asleep, and you will find it ringing with the voices of children at play, and all alive with the glimmering phantasms of leap frog, prison bump, or knock-out-punch.—John Neal.
