Choose Best Varieties For Live Stock Fodder.

Should Ripen at Least a Few Ears-The Grain Is Nonrishing-Frosen Corn Preferred to Immature-Harvesting Root Crops. (Contributed by Ontario Department of

The highest grade of corn silage is made from those varieties of corn that produce a large proportion of grain in the total weight of crop. Large growing southern varieties of dent corn that give an immense green weight of fodder per acre will as a rule produce a very poor stinge under Ontario conditions. Many dairymen prefer fint varieties and the smaller stalk varieties of early maturing dents for silage purposes. From-such a rich sweet slings can be made. The weight per acre may not be nearly as great as with the late maturing large growing dents, but when the sligges are compared on the digestible dry matter basis the smaller growing earlier maturing dents and flints have the advantage. Use Corn_Ripening Some Ears. The experience of the past has shown that only such varieties as will ripen at least a few ears should be used. In early years of sile experience in Ontario the practice was to grow big corn. Little attention was paid to the grain yield; much poor silage resulted from the twelve to fourteen-foot stalks that went into the silo without the very necessary two pound well glased ear. Hard experience has demonstrated that there is more milk, beef or butterfat in a cubic foot of slage made from corn that would busk out one hun-

These varieties will ripen in the southwestern countles of Ontario, and they will generally reach the rossting ear state over the greater part of the dairy section of the Province. The greatest quantity of digestible dry matter is to be obtained from a corn crop when it has reached the condition to cut for husking, ripe enough to complete maturity in the shock. Another advantage in growing the earlier maturing varieties is that such can be ensiled
