Particularly to us saking for contributions You know how it is, and instead of coming out frankly and declaring "I don't intend giving towards that object," We are much more likely to say something about not having any money -to-day, with the intimation that perhaps later on we might have something to spare. As a matter of fact, in many such instances we have no nfention of giving anything to that particular cause for which it is sought to enlist our sympathies only we don't say so. Our expect ation is that the collector will not bother to come back again and ometimes we are considerably taken back when he comes around again to see if we are in a better mood. It is the same with book agents and canvassers in generalwe would only be outspoken at the outset, we would save the canvassers and ourselves further wasted time and in the long run we would retain just as many friends by being perfectly candid and outspoken about it.
