that comes from three or four hundred their Meas as well as the Halton Regimen in animated conversation and the accompaniment of as many tin plates, and as many tin cups, all in action; the whole contributing to the Pandemonium of noises that ceased as the men stiffened into attention at the sound of the Orderly Bergeants whistle and waited for the inevitable question from the Orderly Officer, "Any complaints?" and the inevitable answer, "None, sir." After this drams the men fell to and the noise was resumed.

"Halt there!" yelled the officer to the orderly, who halted, while his mouth, and his mind turned over his many sins and their possible punishment. "Get me a spoon!" This was addressed to the Sergeant, who dived into a tent, and reappeared with the utensil required. The officer tasted that soup, while the scarce orderly tried hard to find his tongue. "Why damm it, Sergeant; that's mobetter than dish water." "Yes, Sir; yes, Sir," working to capacity. Furniture manustammered the recovered orderly, "that's what it is, Sir." Man is a fire worshipper, an inheritance from remote ancestry; and he is also a cook, though his wife may think otherwise; but in any case he likes to catch or shoot his own game and to build a fire and watch it cook, and then eat it. On Service he has full scope to all this, and it is one of the great compensations for the rightly some and hardship of service; these facts were overlooked when Innovation apread his canvass over the whole Regiment and erected pine tables to which the various companies marched with lock step precision, and all of this is just my opinion, and it will in no way effect the messing situation, which is now considered a great improvement on conditions as they were. To an efficiency expert it is a great improvement: to a paychologist, who considers the effect on the mind of the soldier, and the social loss when the little squad familles take their meals out, in the great tabernacle, where conversation is impossible, without a megaphone—to him who places the happiness and morale of his men in the first place, there is a decided at these annual evilutions.

Presiding over these camp fires were the company cocks, with a philosophy of life that is peculiar to cooks in the army, and whose comments and speculations on the service general was as the concertons from the army, and whose comments and speculations on the service general was as refreshing the concortons from the camp base to the physical being of the men, to whom the cook lines and atmosphere was a never ending source of attraction.

It is true that when the weather was wet, and the wood would not burn, and the dinner would not cook, the cook lines were a good place to keep away from; and the cook in his incantations made many contributions to profane literature; and any adverse criticism of the product of those blizies, that gurgled sway under his mugic wand was a liberty that no man would take—no, no even the Orderit Offer.
