rists do not like to turn back. One of their aversions is the re-tracing of a route once travelled. If they pass a place of refreshment or shelter that they intended to visit, they go on in the hope that something equally good will offer itself. They wish to see new scenes and have new experiences all along the way. Life is not unlike motoring. We never go back; it is a pity when we want to. Each part of the journey should be so pleasing that we are content to go on. The end is somewhere just around the bend shead of us and the more intriguing because it is out of sight. The uncertainty suggests adventure, the exploring of uncharted territorty, the beginning of a new and better road. Let us then, go on with
