The SNAPSHOT GUILD

KNOW YOUR CAMERA

The amateur who took this prize-winning picture had mastered his camera.

Thousands of dollars each year in business and printing instruction books which are enclosed with each camera. These books give valuable information on the use and care of the camera but the average person looks only far enough into the instructions to find out how to insert the film and right there they stop.

United States, the picture shown above was awarded a first prize in the major prize in the national exhibition.

The snapshotter who took the picture was far from being old in experience but it is quite evident that he had made a study of his hobby and knew what he was doing and what could be expected of his camera.

Study the composition of your pictures, that is, "compose" your picture in your viewfinder before clicking the shutter. Perhaps by stepping forward a few feet you can eliminate some incongruous object—something that may really detract from the point of interest in the picture. Try viewing a scene or subject from different angles, then choose the one you think the most attractive.
