LOCKED THE GATES AT LEVEL CROSSINGS
Level crossings have long been a nightmare to harassed generations of railway operating officials since the building of the first railway in Canada one hundred years ago. In the Lawrence Road—the first bit of line in the network of nation-wide coverage which is now the Canadian National Railway—it is estimated that whenever the route of the proposed railway that was to run between Lake and St. Johns a distance of some sixteen miles) crossed a public road or highway, that a gate should be erected by the railway company on each side of the tracks. These gates were to be kept closed and bolted and the driver of any "carriage, cart, wagon or train of waggons" was required to unlock the gates and "beat the train to the crossing" on his journey. If he failed to do this he was liable to a penalty of five dollars for each gate left unbolted although it must have been a difficult matter to detect the innocent. As it must have taken several minutes to open and close both gates and get the conveyances safely across the "beating the train" procedure was moreover since the maximum speed attainable by the locomotive of that time which is about one quarter of that attained on such track flyers as to reflect that the danger of accident was reduced to a minimum.
