problem, from the point of view of the Mrs. A. Benton and the election of pupil, is the possibility of his receiving, during his elementary school days, some guidance as to the place he is best fitted to fill in his later years. It may be thought that the elementary school says is too young to make any measure of vocatinal guid-ance possible. Such, however, I feel is not the case. If teachers will give reasonable thought to this matter, take special pains to study the aptitudes and win the confidence of their pupils, they may do much through personal talks with them to discover ambitions and kleals which they may be able to direct into practical channels. Systematic effort of this kind would have a rich reward, I am sure. I have always felt that for such purpose, there should be the fullest possible co-operation and sympathy between parents and teachers. Such joint counsel as would result from such introdurse as this would be invaluable. Parents would do well to recognize the help that a sympathetic teacher might render.
