When the world is dark and unisviting there is something out of gear with anatomy. If you could only see it there are the same colors in the rainbow as there were for Noah. The sun shines with the same laster bare as it does in Hesperides. Even the clouds have alivery lining and the stare twinkle throughout the night. But the trouble is we often can't see them. There are a thousand smokes from the great busy world that obscure the sun. There are countiess steams that hide the startight. They obscure the light in the heavens above because the industry of mortale changes substances on the earth below. The more there is of it the greater the man-made things that turn our minds from the great nature-preduced glories.
