The night clerk here tells me that up to a few nights ago they had black and cinnamon bear in their back yard every night and once in the kitchen of the hotel on Remembers and once in the kitchen of the hotel at the garbage box. And deer roam the streets all winter, there are wolves round the outskirts and the deer know the one safe place. It is just about zero and a thin layer of anow covers the ground. Off again at 3.30 a.m. for Illus River and we will be right in the midst of the mountains by daybreak today. The Calabad Pass, Sunday, daylight, and the mountains. What a sight. We are following the North Thompson river which winds like a great green anake far below. Timber clad and anow covered mountains pass in a swift procession of rugged peaks, Down on the edge of the raying but well above the edge of the ravine but well above the river, passing through tunnels swinging round rockbound corners with a sheer drop of hundreds of feet with a sheet drop of hundreds of feet we rear along at a good speed. Mt. Robson, highest peak in the rockies, is in plain view, its crest shrouded in clouds. We are coming into Mt. Robson station. Looking down from our perch 800 ft. up we have a wonderful view of the river, forest, ravine and mountain. No photo could do justice to this picture. It is alive, beautiful and immense. Pacing us up a wedge-shaped ravine, many miles away, is another ridge of snow-capped mountains. The old O.T.P. road to Prince Rupert is still in view far below. In a few minutes it will branch off when we fow minutes it will branch off when we turn south to Vancouver. There is a
