Tuning In on the Heart

A of the human heart magnified one hundred times, has recently been placed in experimental use, according to an announcement by the Northern Electric Company, Limited, in Montreal.

The device is an Electrical Stethoscope, based upon the telephone principle with the heart doing the "talking". Originally it was developed for a medical student whose poor hearing prevented him from using the ordinary stethoscope; its success, however, aroused immediate interest among physicians whose hearing is becoming dulied, and those whose practice takes them into noisy places. Moreover, it is found most useful in disgnosing pathological conditions of the heart, as by simply throwing a switch, high or low tones may be emphasized or eliminated, as desired, thus segregating the sounds peculiar to certain diseases for more careful attention.

The antire stethoscope weights less than a full instrument case

The entire stethoscope weights less than a full instrument case and is about half the size, using two "Peanut" Tubes and miniature transformers. It forms a striking contrast to the larger hospital type model which was earlier developed by the Hell Telephone Laboratories, and is used for auditorium demonstrations and at the largest hospitals where almost an unlimited number can listen-in at the same
