Reached a Final Decision

By DUFORD JENNE

"SO THAT is the final word, is it, Avery?" he asked, looking off into the fragment of sunset with a wistful smile.

"I'm not sure it is hard for me, I do like you, I enjoy being with you; but, hand, I'm not just—just ready—my music, you know, is half my dream," she said gently.

"I wonder—I wonder if you will do just one thing more for me. I hate to ask you—but I feel that I have to—the happiness of one I love," he queried, hesitatingly.

"It felt her warm, slender fingers laid on his hand.

"I can't give you myself," she warned him quietly, "but anything else—ask and ask."

"He pondered the request—should he make it or should he not?

"It's just this, Avery, father, as you know, is alone. Mother's been dead for twenty years. Father, as we know, has been away from home for five, and he knows it. I took you to the old home, he saw you, and came to love you in those brief hours we were there. He's reached the point where memories are pretty dear to him, and he likes to talk of the old home once more as he knew it—with a lovely girl in it with me when he had some. Somehow, I felt sure enough of you to let him believe we were close to engagement. I am sorry the situation is this.

"She smoothed his hair with gentle touch. "I can forgive that deception."

"He raised her hand to his lips. "But the trouble is an abdominal ailment, and I know it would bring death to him in these last, precious hours. I know it is an unusual request, Avery, and I will be party to it, my dear. You know the answer, and I will go," she said finally.

"Hand brought the car to her hotel the next morning, and she saw the power motor was carrying its message of swift miles past.

"He looked down at the dark back of his shoulder, smiled a bit at the side of his head, and with a contented smile, he said to himself, "I know it would bring death to him in these last, precious hours. I know it is an unusual request, Avery, and I will be party to it, my dear. You know the answer, and I will go," she said finally.

Local Bank Observes 30th Anniversary

That early generation of Canadian business men, it is necessary to delve deeply into the history of the country.

The only organized portions of what is now the Dominion of Canada were the Province of Upper and Lower Canada and the Maritime Provinces. Their whole population was less than 600,000, and that of Montreal, the chief trading center, less than 20,000. The development of trade and agriculture was hampered by lack of facilities for exchange. The country was too poor to afford the luxury of a metallic circulating medium, and not only American, British and French, but also Portuguese and Spanish coins were legal tender, and the value of exchange into colonial money of account were subject to frequent variations. As a consequence, domestic trade was carried on principally by barter, and international trade was on a very uncertain basis.

Such were the conditions when the Bank of Montreal began business on 2nd November, 1817, in modest rented premises, with a paid-up capital of $200,000. In a very short time this institution became the focal point of the business of the colony. It provided a medium of exchange such as had hitherto been lacking, nursed along the early enterprises of the country, and advanced out of the manufacturing of lumber, iron, agricultural, and international trade.

Everywhere as conditions have become more advanced, the branches of the bank have facilitated the agricultural development of the country, its manufacturing industries, and its general commerce.

Today the Bank has over five hundred branches distributed throughout Canada and Newfoundland, with its paid-up capital and reserves representing a total in excess of $18,000,000, and its assets over $160,000,000. The value of the Bank to the country however, is not to be measured so much by the amount of its capital, but by the amount of its deposits, and the increase of commodities, and the assistance it has contributed to the development of the country.

The Branches of the Bank of Montreal are situated in the large business centres and in residential districts, agricultural communities, and in mining camps. Everywhere in Canada it is a factor in the life of the community, and by its standing its industrial connections it is essentially a Bank of the people. A Bank where small accounts are welcome, a Bank to which all classes can come with confidence in the security of their deposits, and to its care, and with the assurance that every facility consistent with sound banking will be extended to those who seek its services.

ITS IN YOUR FACE

You don't have to tell how you live each day; You don't have to say if you work or you play; A tried, true barometer serves in the place; However, you live, it will show in your face.

The fall, the cheer, that you bear in your heart; Will not stay inside where it first got a start; For stress and blood are a thin veil of lace— What you wear in your heart, you wear in your face.

If your life is uncertain, if for others you live; For not what you get, but how much you can give; If you live close to God in his infinite grace— You don't have to tell it, it shows in your face.

PAINT PRICES SHARPLY REDUCED

A sharp reduction in the price of first quality house paint to $3.75 per gallon is announced by the manufacturers of some of Canada's best-known brands of paint, the reduction to take effect immediately.

In making the announcement, the companies concerned state that the reduction is not justified by any change in market conditions or manufacturing costs. They point out, however, that during the past few years many householders have been misled by the bargain price into using inferior paint with results that reacted unfavorably on the whole industry. Drastic action was felt to be necessary to check a situation that seriously threatened property values all over the country.

"The new low price is designed to make it easier for property owners to use first quality paint only, with resulting benefit to property and to the community in general.

The companies announcing the reduction are Canada Paint, International Varnish, Martin-Bonour and Sherwin-Williams.

JANE HETHERINGTON AND HIS MULE

Thousands of stories have been told of human affection existing between man and his mule, dog and cat, but the devotion of a man for a mule is unusual for a male animal is looked upon as a vicious animal inclined to kick at the slightest opportunity. However, the mule in this instance was very gentle and affectional.

Some years ago an English coal miner, Jacob Hetherington came to this country and settled near Belleville, Ohio. He inherited a mule, though he could neither read or write. It appears that he had a slight amount of money, and he bought a mule on the banks of the Ohio River, near Belleville. Later he bought eight acres of land on credit. He got out his coal with pick and shovel and wheeled it out on a wheelbarrow. Later he "took a shine" to a mule, and he bought one. This partner was his little mule "Jack."

For many years Mr. Hetherington, or Jack as he was familiarly called, mined his own coal with the help of his mule, but active little partner, Jack was indeed a "little partner" for he stood only 5 ft. high. An time went on an unusually strong affection grew between the man and the mule, and probably less than most understand each other perfectly. Jack was never kicked nor beaten, but controlled wholly through kind words.

As time went on Mr. Hetherington's business grew to the point where he was mining hundreds of tons of coal a day. Mr. Hetherington in the meantime had been a shrewd business man. He invested his money in many paying ventures. His eight acres increased to 800. He owned shares in glass works; owned some thirty houses and a number of steamboats that plied up and down the Ohio River. He could not read the names on his own steamboats, but he knew them by sight.

About the year 1870 Mr. Hetherington built a beautiful residence on the banks of the Ohio, said to have cost over $35,000, a huge sum for that day. He inherited his money in many paying ventures. His eight acres increased to 800. He owned shares in glass works; owned some thirty houses and a number of steamboats that plied up and down the Ohio River. He could not read the names on his own steamboats, but he knew them by sight.

After the house was completed and furnished, Mr. Hetherington held a house warming to which his neighbors and friends were invited. In the presence of the assembled company, Mr. Hetherington led his faithful mule, Jack, all over the house and explained every detail to him, and of course Jack understood in his mule way.

Jack lived many years longer to the day of old age. He was forty years old at the time of his death, a venerable old mule whose hair had turned almost snow white. While Jack received the best of care during his last sickness, his time was out. Mr. Hetherington was genuinely grieved at the loss of his partner and for many years later he would show visitors Jack's grave under an apple tree near his home.

Although unlearned, and perhaps eccentric on some points, Jacob Hetherington was a man of fine

Watch Your Perspective

WHAT would your girl friend or wife say if you made your appearance with her picture after the Sunday outing, showing her with enormous feet such as those in the picture to the left?

War would probably be declared when you made the familiar statement, "Well, dear, the camera never lies." But the truth is that the camera didn't lie for it caught just what the lens saw.

Evidently the amateur who took the picture held the camera quite low and probably less than three feet from the two feet of the attractive young lady. Her head and shoulders were at the right distance from the camera to give good perspective, but her feet were perhaps thirty-six inches nearer the lens.

Perspective in a picture is determined by the point of view from which the lens makes the picture, so after all the camera did not tell a lit-
