The Dish Knot

THE child clung shyly to her homespun skirt. "I will walk far as the brook with Ruth and thee, Timkins," she promised. "Then thou wilt go alone with her like a big, brave man!"

SHORT STORY

"Thou hast made a baby of him, Rosemary!" cried Ruth; the grave dignity of a step-mothering bride upon her face. She had come hither to take home the lad. Rosemary smiled wistfully over the curly head for which she had cared so tenderly since his sweet, young mother had died. "Could Ruth know that Timothy Pratt had asked her to take a second wife's place in his bereaved home? Could Ruth guess that loving Timkins had made her hesitate to refuse the offer? What new wisdom lay in the depths of the eyes of Timothy? Rosemary faltered at the gulf of experience that had yawned between them.

"Thou wilt love the lad," she said. He gave Ruth one chubby hand to hold as they went along the path. The meadow had turned green over night. Spring was opening with a rush. There would be cowslips in blossom beside the brook Rosemary had set for a parting place. An ax rang in the distance. "Truman Brewster is cutting logs to lay up a cabin for himself," said Ruth. "He told Timothy he meant to use the cleared land for an orchard; but it would be more to the purpose if he took himself off instead of staying around to keep the girls so unsettled! Why, if I had been so silly about him as some others I know of, I wouldn't have listened to Timothy. Now I have a good husband and a comfortable home. Truman Brewster hasn't so much as a dish knot to make bowls of!"

Rosemary felt her face grow hot. No one knew how hard she had tried not to be silly about Truman Brewster. Yet she probably would have listened to Timothy Pratt, but for her secret memories of him; the challenging ring of his voice; the accidental touch of his hand on the latch string; a questioning flash of his gray eyes; some things that might mean nothing, or anything. The little lad had run ahead on the path. He caught sight of a clump of golden cowslips in bloom beside the swollen brook at the bottom of the slope. The water was running rapidly, and when Timkins climbed on a stranded log to reach the cowslips the force of his moving weight pushed it afloat in the middle of the swirling stream. He lay flat and clung with both hands.

Rosemary heard Ruth scream behind her as she sped down the path. She dared not scream herself lest she frighten the little lad and lose his precarious hold upon the floating log. The bank of the brook was sodden with flooded water. Already the log had floated some distance down stream, and Rosemary chased through the morass after it. She was ankle deep in slush. "I'll run ahead of the ford," thought Rosemary.

By scrambling fast she managed to reach the ford ahead of the log. She had just time to wade out on to the submerged sand bar upon which horses and wagons crossed the stream. The log was coming toward her with a swinging motion that would make it difficult to catch and hold. Perhaps she could swing it ashore. It was almost impossible to keep her footing on the sand bar with the cold, cold water swirling around her knees. The log gave a twitch and plunge that knocked her down, but Rosemary managed to cling to it. Timkins crowded with delight as if it were a game. Somehow she managed to reassure him. She had fallen forward and knelt breast high in the cold, cold water. She could not rise and keep her hold upon the log where Timkins clung so happily. She began inch by inch to creep ashore. Had she strength to make it?

"Steady, my girl!" rang a vibrant voice. She dared not answer. Another inch toward shore! Another inch before his hands seized Timkins. Yet Rosemary clung to the log until the same strong hands lifted her to her feet. "Don't let it go, Truman! It's dish timber!" she muttered.

The strong man waded in again and returned with the dripping log on his shoulder. "We're so much ahead!" he said. Rosemary put out her hand to claim the log. In those pioneer days when nearly all the table and kitchen utensils were whittled from wood, the finding of good dish timber was the discovery of essential raw material. A single excellent white ash knot like this log would make a whole nest of necessary bowls and trenchers. Rosemary put her hand on the wet wood to claim it. And Truman's hand closed pressure. "We're so much ahead!" he repeated. "Rosemary! I thought I would wait, until I saw thy face when you knelt there in the water. It will take a lot of courage to start life with me, but you've got it! O Rosemary! I've always loved thee."

California Chef Shares His Citrus Secrets

By BETTY BARCLAY

Every well-known chef has cherished secrets of flavor that have brought fame to his foods and himself. Oranges and lemons answer the "what makes it so good" riddle for many of the foods served by Gus Waser, chef of the famous Los Angeles Biltmore Hotel. As proof of what may be done with these popular California fruits, Mr. Waser demonstrated some of his best known citrus fruit dishes before a recent convention of stewards and caterers. While some of his suggestions are for more elaborate combinations, others are so simple that any woman may give a "chef's" glamour to many of her everyday foods by following them. Chief among Chef Waser's citrus secrets is the use of lemons for garnish and flavor accompanying shell fish and other seafoods, vegetables, such as spinach, and beverages, such as tea. These garnishes include decorative fancy alices and practical juice-providing quarters. One Biltmore specialty easily duplicated in any home is to serve well-chilled melon with two or three lemon quarters. The lemon heightens the sweetness and flavor of the melon. "Whipped Sweet Potatoes in Orange Shells" is another good-to-eat and easy-to-prepare novelty of Chef Waser's. This is a colorful and decorative accompaniment for baked ham or the roast fowl of the Thanksgiving and Holiday seasons. Whipped Sweet Potatoes in Orange Shells 4 cups boiled or baked sweet potatoes 2 teaspoons salt 2 tablespoons melted butter Orange juice to moisten and whip Whip sweet potatoes with salt, butter and orange juice. Pack into: 8 orange shells Keep in moderate oven (350° F.) for about 20 minutes, or until heated through. (Serves 8.) For orange shells, choose fruit with clean skins. The California Naval oranges in season during winter months are especially excellent for this purpose. Cut tops off oranges. Remove juice and pulp, leaving shells clean. Juice is used to whip potato.
