Simplification of Words In Writing Is Gaining

William the Conqueror was to blame for many of the orthographical peculiarities of the English language, according to Professor De Witt Clinton Croissant, head of the English department at George Washington University, writes Roy Eastin in the Washington Star.

"English was originally a phonetic language, and the Norman scribes thought that they were writing it phonetically. But they heard the language differently and they used a different set of symbols," Professor Croissant said. He has advocated simplified spelling for more than 20 years.

His fight is gradually making progress, he believes, and cites the changes in government documents in spelling "catalog" instead of "catalogue" and "cigaret" instead of "cigarette."

The adoption of some newspapers of such forms as "thru," "nite" and "tho" are considered steps forward by the professor.

As examples of the progress made, he cites James Howell's grammar of 1662, which recommended that "logique" be changed to "logic" and "sinne" be changed to "sin" and that "bodilie" be made "bodily," all of which have come about.

Johnson's dictionary of 1775 is blamed by the professor for "crystallizing our spelling."

"The words with their unnatural spellings were embalmed and since then it has been considered sacrilegious to disturb the corpse," he said.

Nosh Webster was an advocate of simplified spelling, and his first dictionary contained forms far more simplified than even the Simplified Spelling Board recommended. Henry Holt, late publisher, estimated that a 15 per cent reduction in the cost of books could be brought about by leaving out silent letters.

Diamond-Backed Turtle Saved by U. S. Fisheries

Diamond-backed terrapins, headed for total extinction a few years ago, apparently have been saved as a species through the efforts of the U. S. bureau of fisheries, according to the Washington Evening Star.

In the gay nineties this reptile was a symbol of sinfully extravagant living. Such high prices were paid that all the sounds, estuaries and swamps along the south Atlantic coast were scoured for the creatures. By the turn of the century they were fabulously scarce.

The demand dropped off with prohibition. This probably saved the terrapin, since it gave a breathing spell and an opportunity for the government biologists to get the race on a secure footing again. Up to late more than 125,000 young have been shipped from the bureau of fisheries station at Beaufort, S. C., for restocking the salt marshes of the southern states. The brood stock of the station, most of which had more than 2,000 females.

New methods of incubation devised by Dr. H. F. Prytherch promise a considerably larger production in the future.

All-American Roofing

The asphalt shingle is the only all-American roofing material. It is not only used on three out of every five houses, but it is the only popular type roofing to be originated and developed in this country. The first mineral surfaced asphalt shingle was made by H. M. Reynolds, of Grand Rapids, Mich., in 1902. The shingle was an immediate success, but it was not until the war that it received its first great acceptance. Since that time its use has increased steadily, spurred by an increasing demand for a fire-resistant roofing, and by a growing popular preference for more colorful roofs.

Tar Heels Proud of Tarnish

North Carolinians are proud of the green-tarnished dome of the state capital in Raleigh. Built 100 years ago, the capital was given a bright copper-coated dome; time and weather has turned the copper to a bright blue-green. When a bill came up before the legislature a few years ago, to re-copper the dome, or at least shine it, the motion was helved as lobbyists claimed that it would take away much of the atmosphere and antiquity of the building.

Europe Uses Most Fertilizer

Consumption of fertilizer in the United States is at the rate of five pounds per acre per farm. Nations of Europe rank far ahead of this country in fertilizer use. Holland uses 99 pounds of chemical plant food per acre annually, Belgium 80 and Germany 67. The former Denmark with 40, Norway with 29 and Sweden with 22 pounds. France uses 21 pounds per acre, Italy 17 and Great Britain 12.

Eternal City

Rome was known as the Eternal City among the ancient Romans, because the people thought that no matter what happened in the world, no matter how many other empires might rise and fall, Rome would go on forever. In Virgil's Aeneid Jupiter tells Venus that he will give the Romans an eternal empire.
