FEEDING DAIRY COWS ON PASTURE

Pasture provides the cheapest feed available for milk production, and it is highly desirable to provide cows with an abundance of fresh green herbage as long as possible throughout the pasture season. Early grazing helps to accomplish this. C. D. MacKenzie, Division of Animal Husbandry, Dominion Experimental Farms Service, also suggests practising rotational grazing, using annual pasture crops such as oats and sudan grass, and providing the cows with aftermath from part of the area used for hay. Also, silage and soiling crops can often be used to supplement the regular pastures, particularly during the latter part of the

On good pasture cows giving from 30 to 35 pounds of milk daily need very little grain. However, cows giving over this amount require one pound of meal for each three pounds of milk produced above it. As young growing grass is high in protein, a meal mixture composed of home-grown grains such as oats and barley is satisfactory. With more mature grasses, however, it is advisable to add a small amount of inseed oil meal or ground soybeans to the home grown grains in order to properly balance the ration. In addition, sufficient water, a supply of salt, and a mineral mixture should be supplied, taking care that the cows have snade and protection from flies.
