Canadian Pacific Women Fill Enlisted Men's Places

Invading such predominantly masculine strongholds as locomotive shops and maintenance of way gangs, women have been helping to take up part of the slack caused by the enlistment of 10,285 men in the active armed forces from the Canadian Pacific Railway. At the first of September this year there were 675 women employed by the Canadian Pacific in positions normally filled by men.

This layout shows some of the women at work. Giving the final touches to the top of a locomotive in the roundhouse at Sudbury, Ont., are Olive Kennedy cleaning up the number plate and Jennie Neil doing some other cleaning.

Smiling Vivian Constant, at the phone and allouetted against the engine crew call board, is call "boy" for 77 crews in the locomotive shops at North Bay, Ont., while Mary Lemieux, pictured chalking up directions as a car checker, also works in North Bay where her father, Joe Lemieux, is a Canadian Pacific trainman.

Father-daughter combinations are not unusual now as demonstrated by the railroading Sauves of Sudbury in the picture where Fred Sauve, company boiler-maker, sees how close he can come to his daughter, Isabelle Sauve, an engine wiper, with a bit of grease.

The list of women doing men's jobs shows there are 294 on sea-air lines and 171 in the West. The mechanical and operating departments while the operations department is the largest.
