RAILWAY STATION OF THE FUTURE

New, artistic design of the Canadian National Railway's stations symbolizes in field stone and glass the streamlining trend of the modern age. The top illustration shows the architect's drawing of the street elevation of the first of these new stations.

Gone are the dimly-lit waiting rooms and dull painted walls of railway stations. The new Canadian National "station of the future" is the last word in appointments and travellers' conveniences and looks as modern as the newest streamline locomotive. Specially designed by John Schofield, Chief Architect of the Canadian National System, the station building is 74 feet long, 24 feet wide and 12 feet in height, and its streamline appearance is somewhat revolutionary when compared with the old, standard type of station. A three-foot dado of field stone covers the hidden concrete wall structure and huge glass windows continue the remainder of the wall space to the overhanging, seven-foot-wide roof projection over the 700 foot long platform. The ticket office bay also is glass on three sides above the field stone base assuring the public rooms a flood of sunlight. The baggage and express rooms on the opposite end of the station continue the cedar board finish which features the street corner of the waiting room above the field stone, and the interior of colored glazed tiles and indirect electric lighting is equally modern. J. F. Pringle, vice-president and general manager of the Central Region, announced that the first of these "stations of the future" will be constructed at Midland, Ont., to replace the former wooden structure destroyed by fire.

Heroes of Westerham

(Contributed by M. A. B.)

The thirteenth of September will always bring to the minds of Canadians one illustrious name in particular—that of Major General James Wolfe, the hero of Quebec. To some of those within the old land he is as well, hero of Westerham. And to-day quaint, quiet Westerham in Kent has provided another hero in the person of the Right Honourable Winston Churchill—Man of the Hour—Man of our Need.

Chartwell Manor, home of the Prime Minister of Great Britain, lies less than three miles from Quebec House. And on Sept. 13th this year we found Winston Churchill upon that soil sacred to the memory of Wolfe of Quebec—the hero of 1759.

While one cannot write extensively of our War-time Prime Minister at the present time, one may quote from an address given in London some time ago by Miss Dorothy Thompson—America's most famous columnist. Miss Thompson, in her address, warned Hitler that he is battling against a man who had shown that in his veins flowed the blood of the fighting Marlboroughs—a man whose ancestors' watchword was "England."

John Churchill, first Duke of Marlborough, like his descendant, Winston Spencer Churchill, was the man in England's hour of need, an hour when all Europe was threatened by the world-dominance of one single man—Louis of France. After the battles of Blenheim, of Ramillies, of Oudenarde, and Malplouquet, thanks to the genius and indomitable courage of Colonel John Churchill, England rose from being one of a dozen minor powers, to find herself the leader of Europe against a Grand Monarque. "Once again we cry 'A Churchill, a Churchill, as we battle against Hitler and his myrmidons, Goering and the sinister Goebbels."

So, we find to-day, a man of Kent, treading the same paths of glory (though in a different manner) upon the same soil as that "Bad Boy of Kent" who became the Conqueror of Canada.

James Wolfe was born on January 2nd, 1727 at Westerham, Kent; and was the eldest son of a distinguished soldier, Major General Edward Wolfe. His mother was Henrietta, daughter of Edward Thompson of Marsden, Yorkshire. As Major General Wolfe was on duty in Spain at the time of the birth, the boy was born at "The Vicarage" a little way up the hill from Quebec House.

Wolfe spent his boyhood days up to his eleventh year, at "Splers", as Quebec House was called up to some period in the 18th Century. It is fitting that this historical home should have been purchased by a Canadian—the late Mr. J. B. Learmont of Montreal. In 1918 Mrs. Learmont presented the house to the National Trust. The building had been standing for two hundred years or more, when the Wolfes went to Westerham in 1726. Though enduring many alterations, I am glad to note that its former owner, the late Col. Charles Warde of Squerries Court had restored to it the lines of the original 17th Century plan—the three gables being replaced.

Within, one finds many pieces of interest relating to Major General Wolfe, collected and presented to Quebec House by A. O. Wolfe-Aylward, Esquire, a great, great nephew of General Wolfe. The late Mr. Wolfe Aylward lived here for some nineteen years. Among the fine collection of pictures and old prints, one may find many drawings and paintings of the Canada of bygone days.

A bronze bust of Wolfe, after the marble, by Joseph Wilton the Sculptor of the Monument to General Wolfe in Westminster Abbey, is found within the entrance hall. The original is in the Public Archives at Ottawa.

It may be recalled that Wolfe, at the age of fourteen, was given a commission, as second lieutenant in his father's regiment of Marines, and two years later he was acting-adjutant at the battle of Dettingen, where King George II so distinguished himself.

In 1745 when Wolfe was just eighteen, he lived up to his reputation as Westerham's red-headed "Bad Boy of Kent", by refusing to carry out the commands of (Butcher) Duke of Cumberland to shoot & wound Highlanders—Fraser of Interlochy. Wolfe was, at this time, Alde-de-Camp to General Hawley. "Shoot the dog," said Hawley. Wolfe replied: "My commission is at your disposal, but I will not shoot him." The 13th of September, 1759, on the Plains of Abraham, Wolfe died in the arms of one Fraser of Lovat. His body was wrapped within a flag carried by the 1st Cheshires, that same fateful day, which now hangs within the Cathedral at Chester. Below the faded, tattered flag is a panoramic view of The Citadel, as it appears today.

So much for the Wolfe of Battles. But, as is natural to youth, romance came to soften the hardships of a soldier's life. After living down an unhappy engagement in his earlier years, James Wolfe at length found happiness in the love of a beautiful girl—Katherine, Lowther—a sister to the first Earl of Lonsdale. The night before his death, the young General entrusted the miniature of his betrothed to his friend, Jervis, (afterward Lord of St. Vincent), to return to his mother should anything happen to him. In his will he had directed that the picture be set in jewels to the cost of £500, and returned to his fiancée, Miss Lowther six years later married the Second Duke of Bolton.

The statue of General Wolfe on The Green, Westerham, is supposed to be a perfect likeness of the youthful general, and was dedicated by Field Marshal Earl Roberts, in 1911.

About the Square, where stands the figure in bronze of The Hero of Quebec, one finds, strangely enough, the same type of architecture as one sees in The Citadel today. The three-storey buildings with high-pitched gable roof suggest that view before the Basilica in the market-place on the brow of the hill in Quebec city. Possibly, some of the returned men of Kent, who fought under Wolfe in Canada, may have introduced this French influence. This is merely conjecture upon our part.

Before we leave historic Westerham, we wind our way through memories' pleasant lanes along the road that runs past Quebec House, called Pilgrim's Way, because of devout pilgrims who trod the cruel stones to the tomb of Thomas A. Becket of Canterbury. Earlier still, Roman Legions were known to have travelled it in their conquest of Britain. As we travel in mind to the opposite end of the Town, past Squerries Court and Lodge, we find at length the XI Century building called Pitt's Cottage, from its having been the favourite hunting lodge of Pitt the Younger.

So, to a quiet unassuming little Town within the shadow of the Surrey Hills came three of the greatest men in the history of England—soldier, statesman, and, perhaps greatest of all, our present day Soldier—Statesman, who came to our shores, and who no doubt, when he departs, will cherish deep within his heart, the motto of Quebec—the oldest Province in our land—"Je Me Souviens."

RIGOROUS REQUIREMENTS FOR C. W. A. C.

Reports from C.W.A.C. Recruiting headquarters for M.D. 2 are to the effect that the ranks of Canada's women soldiers are being increased steadily, although there is no spectacular rush on the part of women to replace a man so that the latter can take his place in the final front line push against the enemy. Recruiting authorities are of the opinion that many would-be recruits are deterred from taking the step that will change their dress from civilian to khaki by the constant rumours and reports that the war will soon be over.

This, and parental objection, appear to be the main reasons why more girls and women are not joining the Canadian Women's Army Corps. Many girls in civilian occupations or graduates from school who are on the threshold of business careers are hesitant about joining because of the first reason, because they think they may soon have to start on the hunt for a civilian job and the latter because they figure they will be in the Army but a short while and by joining they will injure their chances of getting a good position for the post war years.

For those who advance this reason the Army has but one answer and that is there are thousands of recruits necessary for the C.W.A.C., and there is every indication that even after the end of the war there will be work for C.W.A.C.'s for a considerable time.

Many girls who would otherwise fill out application forms are deterred by parental objection. The parents offer the suggestion that their daughters will not get the supervision they do at home nor will they be as carefully guarded, medically, morally and spiritually, as they are at home. To this the C.W.A.C.'s answer is that the supervision in the C.W.A.C. is as close, if not closer than it is in the average Canadian home. In addition the girls who make application are carefully checked over before being instructed to report for a medical examination, preparatory to being attested.

When an intending recruit fills out an application form she is requested to give three or four references—generally the family doctor, her employer and probably her teacher. The application is forwarded to District Recruiting headquarters and those references are contacted. They are requested to give his or her opinion as to the character, health, stability, suitability for Army life and adaptability of the applicant. If these are satisfactory—in some cases the applicant is investigated by a C.W.A.C. social welfare officer—the girl is instructed to report.

After receiving her medical examination she is interviewed by the Army Examiner, a Psychiatrist and other specialists who decide which branch of the Army she is best suited for. Then the girl is outfitted and soon proceeds to Basic Training. Here a progress report is compiled during her stay and before she leaves she is interviewed by another Army Examiner whose report directs the recruit into the particular niche for which she is considered to be best suited.

From the time a recruit enters the C.W.A.C. she is under close supervision of officers and non-commissioned officers who have her best interests at heart. Plenty of healthy exercise and entertainment is provided and there are many classes of instruction—both inside and outside of her regular army hours—that she can attend, preparing herself for her Army career as well as one in civil life, after she is discharged.

"If a girl gets into the Army it is almost certain that she is a fine girl, of excellent character and well above the average in intelligence and it is just as certain she will fit in with the other girls with whom she works and lives," stated Major Madeline St. Laurent, Staff Officer, M. D. 2. "At the present time we need girls who are anxious to serve their country anywhere to the best of their ability."

MICHAEL BEER WINNER OF JAMES HARRIS SCHOLARSHIP

Michael Beer, 18-year-old son of Dr. and Mrs. Paul Beer, of R. No. 2 Georgetown, received the honor of winning a scholarship in mathematics and physics, the James Harris Scholarship, donated by the University of Toronto.

Born in Hungary, Michael attended school there, coming to Toronto about six years ago, where he attended North Toronto Collegiate for some time. Upon moving to Georgetown, when his father purchased the late George Leslie's farm on the Check Line, he attended high school here for three years and has been attending U.T.S., Toronto, for the past year.

TEA, COFFEE RATIONING LIFTED IN CANADA

At the stroke of midnight on September 19th, tea and coffee rationing was lifted in Canada, and for the first time in 26 months consumers can drink all of the beverages that they want.

The rescinding order also allows the sale of more than one cup of tea or coffee to restaurant eaters. Sugar and cream, however, are restricted to the first cup and the five cent additional charge allowed on the first serving is still in force. Successive cups may be charged at a la carte rate.
