Bandit Bait

By VIC YARDMAN, Associated Newspapers, WNU Features.

MIDWAY on the trail between Silver City and Mount Tom, Sheriff Mac Cooper fell in with a tall, fair-haired youth with steel blue eyes, wearing a pearl gray sombrero, blue and white checkered shirt and corduroy trousers tucked into high-heeled boots.

"How far to Mount Tom?" the stranger asked. "Ten mile. Maybe more. Stranger hereabouts, are yuh?" "What are chances o' picking up a job?" "Slim." Mac's eyes went out and across a flat open space, interspersed with sagebrush and cactus beyond, etched against a slope of sage grass, cattle grazed. To the left and more in their line of travel a slope became a rocky incline through which the trail was inclined. "He went on, 'I usta be a cat-man Clean wiped out a year ago."

Mac laughed. "You might as well urn about, stranger. Ranchin' is a 'hing o' the past."

"How do folks get along?" the youth asked, looking at him curiously. "Ain't no other kind o' work to be had, is there? What might your business be? I'd sort of like to get a line on the kind of job to look for."

Mac hesitated the fraction of a second. "Me? I work at the mines up at Big Mines."

The youth grinned. "I get it. You come down once a week for the payoff. On your way back now, eh? Scared maybe I might be Clip Kane, or some other equally desperate character. Had much trouble from this Clip Kane?" he asked suddenly.

"Ain't had none—yet. So far, thank goodness, he's only legend hereabouts. Been operating farther north, in a different state, though they do say he's come over the line an' is working down thisaway."

"That's right, mister. Clip Kane did come over the line, an' he's right here this minute!"

The first thing that Mac noticed was that something hard and round was pressing into his ribs.

"Get your hands up high, mister, an' don't try any tricks. I got hair a mind to plug yuh anyhow. Guys as dumb as you shouldn't be let live."

"But it's a problem how to dispose o' you. I can't leave yuh here to follow me an' spread an alarm, an'—danged if I can shoot such a lumb wit down in cold blood! But, oy jingo, I gotta do something with you." Hardly had the words left the stranger's lips before something smote Mac just back of his right ear. And in the instant before nothingness claimed him he heard, far away, the sharp report of a rifle, a shout, a curse—then the curtain of blackness closed about him.

When he opened his eyes he was half sitting and half lying with his back to the canyon. Objects in front of him gradually lost their blurred aspect and took definite shape. And the first thing that registered itself clearly on his brain was the grinning countenance of Deputy Sheriff Red Galer.

Mac struggled to a more comfortable posture, looked beyond Red and saw the glowering face of Clip Kane. He noted that the bandit was securely trussed and that his shoulder was swathed in a bandage.

"Durn yuh miserable hide," said Mac, addressing Red, "what was the idea of waitin' fer that jigger to tap me on the head before yuh drilled him?"

"A little tap now an' then won't hurt yuh none," Red grinned. "Maybe take some o' the swellin' outter yuh bean."

Mac rubbed his head and swore. He knew that Red had waited purposely in the hope that Clip Kane would tap him, as he called it, but in spite of everything he grinned. "The next time," he said, "we plan to frame a jigger, you're gonna be the goat. Why, that bloke actually told me I was dumb! Now if it had been you—"

"But I reckon," said he amiably, "Mr. Kane is the guy as is dumb, else he would a knowed I was lyin' about them cattle, what with a thousand of 'em grazin' in plain view on that slope."
