Picture for Paper

By BARBARA BENEDICT
Associated Newspapers of Ontario Features.

"THAT Adelaide Evans," said Irene Grant, "has her picture in the paper at least once a week It does seem as though she'd be afraid of leading folks to think she was deliberately seeking publicity!" Irene's voice sounded wholly non-committal, even vague and absent but Allan, her husband, glancing over the top of the Sunday paper's sporting section, detected a gleam in her eyes.

"Jealous?" he asked, ducking out of sight.
"Why, Allan, what a thing to say!
Even in fun. Me? Jealous! Why that's absurd! Who cares about having their old picture in the paper?"

"Every woman on earth," said Allan, still hiding behind the newspaper.

Irene bounded to her feet, thoughfully aroused. "Allan Grant what a positively stupid thing to say! Every woman! My goodness!
I don't care a snap of your fingers about having my picture in the paper!"

"Well, I've seen it there. Aldecked out in your best bib and tucker, too."

"That," said Irene, trying to acquiesce. "It is only because I appeared to be president of our club and they asked for a photograph."

Allan yawned. "Well, why begrudge Adelaide a little publicity if she wants it?" he said, thinking to dismiss the subject.

"Because," Irene replied heatedly. "she doesn't deserve it. She deliberately calls up the newspaper and says she's been doing this and that and the other thing, so they'll publish her picture. They must have a dozen on file."

Allan looked at his wife in amazement. "Say, I thought Adelaide was one of your best friends?"

"She is."

"She is," Irene repeated. "We've been friends for years and years but that doesn't alter my opinion of her. I'm at least honest about it."

"And tactful," said Allan sarcastically. He shook his head sadly.
He had never been able to understand women, despite his fifteen years of married life. He checked the remark that had come to his lips, because just then the telepho-n rang and Irene bounded across the room to answer it.

"Hello!" said Irene, and paused "Oh, hello, Adelaide, darling! How are you? Allan and I were just talking about your picture in today's paper. My dear, I think it's a perfect likeness, and it doesn't flatter you a bit. However, do you keep so young looking? Oh, my dear, what! My picture!
Oh, my dear, no. No, really, I couldn't bear the thoughts of it. I haven't had a photo taken for years, and the last one is really so drab looking. . . Yours? Why, my dear, it was charming. It's a pity they can't publish it more often. It gives a touch of prestige to the club.
you know."

Irene returned to her chair and sat down. The society page lay on the table at her elbow; Adelaide Evans' picture stared back at her.
She studied it for a long time, reading over the caption and brief story accompanying it.

Irene stopped reading and bit her lip. She glanced up at Allan. But Allan's face was invisible behind the paper. She wanted to say something, but she didn't know exactly how to put it in words. Allan had accused her of wanting her own picture published. What an absurd idea! As if she cared! As if such a thing would affect her one way or another!

Five minutes later Allan finished the article he had been reading, and looked around the edge of his paper.
The room he discovered, was empty.
He stood up, grinning to himself, remembering Irene's indignation and remembering, too, her telephone conversation with Adelaide Evans.

En route to the kitchen Allan passed by the bedroom door, glanced inside and saw Irene sitting at her desk there. Something about her attitude arrested his attention. He paused and stepped inside.

Irene, oblivious to the fact she was being watched, was bent over her desk, studying some papers. Allan came up from behind and glanced over her shoulder. The papers, he discovered, were newspaper clippings. Published photographs of Irene herself, carefully clipped and carefully preserved. There were nine in all. She had laid them out beside each other on the desk, and was comparing each with the photograph of Adelaide Evans, which had appeared that day.

Watching, he saw a slow smile, a smile of satisfaction appear on her lips, and he knew that one of the nine clippings had compared favorable with that of Adelaide Evans.
Irene had separated it from the rest and was holding it up for a minute inspection. After a moment she folded it up and tucked it in the pocket of her dress.

Allan retreated as noiselessly as he had entered. He didn't understand but he didn't intend to try.
The thing was beyond him. And even when the next morning Irene gave him a letter to mail, and he saw that it was addressed to the society editor of the local newspaper, he made no comment.

Women, he thought, were strange, mysterious people.
