Doug and Dai

By R. H. WILKINSON
 Associated Newspapers
 WNU Features

DOUG PAYNTER came into the dining room and saw his wife's pocketbook lying conspicuously in the bowl on the table which she used for a centerpiece. He picked it up and opened it. Bills and loose change were stuffed carelessly inside.

Doug's mouth set grimly. He stalked into the bedroom where Dai was sitting at her dressing table arranging her hair.

"How many times have I spoken to you about leaving your pocketbook lying around in plain sight?"

Dai inserted the last pin in her chestnut brown hair. "A thousand at least," she replied brightly. "Would you mind not bothering me now, darling. I'm in a frightful hurry."

She selected a cerise dress from the closet and dropped it over her head.

A white line appeared around Doug's mouth. "Dai, this is the end."

"The end of what, darling?"

"My endurance. I can't put up with it any longer. Your carelessness, I mean."

"Oh, for heaven's sake, Doug!"

"I'm quite serious, Dai. If I were a rich man it would be different. It wouldn't matter if ten or twelve dollars were stolen."

"Stolen? Oh, Doug, that is funny! I've never had a cent stolen from me in my life."

"Abe Furbush had never been hit by an automobile until last week. Now he's dead."

"Oh, for heaven's sake!"

"You can stand there and say 'for heaven's sake' from now till Doom's day. I'm finished."

She looked up suddenly, her eyes wide. "Finished? Doug, you're not serious. Not just because I left—"

"It isn't just what happened today. It's ever day, all the time. Not only leaving your pocketbook around, but carelessness in everything you do."

She stared at him, seeing for the first time the grimness in his eyes, the white line about his mouth.

"Very well, Doug," she said quietly. "If that's the way you want it—"

It wasn't as easy as she expected. Before two days had passed Doug decided he'd rather leave Dai back with all her carelessness than anything in the world.

Her pride and stubbornness forbade her calling her up. If he had thought that she might get in touch with him, beg his forgiveness, promise to do better in the future, he was bitterly disappointed.

He looked at his watch. Four forty-five. In fifteen minutes he would be through work. He would leave for home. Home! A rooming house on Blossom street. A lonely dinner in a near-by restaurant. He sighed deeply and picked up the evening paper. Almost instantly his eye fell on an item on the front page.

"Occupants of Apartment House Robbed by Masked Bandits. More than three thousand dollars taken from residents of 184 Astor street."

"Good heavens! Doug sat bolt upright. That was his address. Dai must have been one of the victims. A horrible fear gripped him. He seized the phone, dialed his insurance company. "Hello, Joe? This is Doug Paynter. Did my wife cash in some insurance policies with you today? She did? Oh, Lord! Well, thanks. So long."

He rang the bell of the apartment. After a long time he heard a step. Then the door opened. It was Dai. Obviously she had been crying.

"Dai!"

"Oh, Doug!"

He took her into his arms, holding her close, talking to her comfortingly. "I got here as soon as I could, honey. I just read it in the paper. You poor kid!"

"Read what in the paper, Doug?"

She sniffled.

"About the robbery," he said, handing her his handkerchief.

"Oh, that." She blew her nose vigorously. "It was pretty awful."

"Did they get it all—the insurance money?"

She shook her head and stuffed the handkerchief back into the pocket of his coat. "They didn't get any."

She smiled at him. "They didn't look in the right places. You see, when I got home with the money I dropped it in the bowl on the dining-room table and neither of the bandits thought to look there. The police officer who came to investigate said I was awfully clever, because thieves never look in the most obvious places. Oh, Doug, you do love me, don't you? You are coming back? And you'll never leave me again, will you?"

"Doug took a deep breath. "Yes, yes and no," he said and kissed her.

Old King Cole

Old King Cole, legendary character of nursery lore, ruled a town in eastern England appropriately named Colchester. Although the name does not memorialize the Ealdstafian figure, Colchester has named one of the massive bastions of the old Roman wall Colkyng's Castle.

The history of Colchester may be traced to the Roman occupation of Britain. Among the early Britons it was known as Caer Colun, which, in the era of the Angles and Saxons, was changed to Colne Caester. Colchester is in normal times a garrison town. It is 52 miles from London.
