GRANDMA RYAN opened the kitchen door for old Matt, with a broad smile on her face and a smudge of flour on her forehead.

"Well, well, I guess feedin' a soldier must be a pretty big job." He eased his bent frame down on to his favorite kitchen chair, near the window. He reached over to hang his wooden cane on the door knob, as he always did. "Is the lad havin' a good rest? Eatin' plenty?" He was settled now for his almost daily visit with his old neighbor.

"I've been bakin' since early morning. I'm certainly glad I've been saving my sugar, but people have been good. Annie Worden sent over a nice piece of baked ham soon's she heard the boy was home. And Mrs. Haines brought over a big jar of peaches. You know my Danny, though, Matt, he thinks there just isn't anyone who can cook as good as his old grandma."

"Besides eatin', what's he been doin'?" There's lots of pretty gals in town eager for attention."

"Yes, Matt, but he's always been such a quiet boy. 'Course, he had to work after school to help us both get along, and I guess he worried about things. I suppose that when a boy is raised by his grandmother it must be kind of a hardship for him. Maybe he doesn't get the same understanding other boys do, maybe."

"Bah!" The old man laboriously lifted one leg over the other. "You've done everything for him since his own parents passed on; worked harder than anyone knows except me . . . to bring him up honest and decent, and you've done a fine job, Lucy Ryan. Just happens some people keep more to themselves than others."

Grandma Ryan poured the shining yellow batter into a round tin. "Ah, I tried my best, anyway, and I can't say that I'm not proud of my boy. But talking of girls, I suspect he still thinks about Ellen Mason. He always seemed to favor her. But she went off to the city to work and then the war came. I guess they kinda lost touch. She's home on a visit now, Mrs. Jordan tells me. She always was awful sweet. 'Course, people change some when they're away from home."

Old Matt absently studied a red square in the linoleum as he sat in silence. His shaggy brows were drawn close together over his eyes. "Let me see now." He slapped his knee. "Aren't they having a dance at Town Club Sunday night?"

"Yes, I mentioned it, but Dan didn't seem to want to go. Said he'd rather stay home with me, but I finally got him to promise he would drop in for a while."

"We'll see that Danny does have some fun," Matt said.

As Dan came in his tanned face glowed from a fresh shave. He looked from one to the other of the old people. "Well, I . . . I guess I'll go." He bent to kiss his grandmother. Then he held his hand out to Matt.

"I'll walk to the gate with you," the old man said. "Want to tell you somethin', sort of man to man." He winked at his old friend, who sat beaming.

Matt watched as Dan gathered his belongings the next day. "I guess your gram's fixing good things for you t' take back."

"My grandma is the best cook in the world," Dan smiled. He paused for a moment and looked at himself in the old stained mirror over his dresser. He squared his broad khaki shoulders.

"Have a good time last night?" Old Matt fingered a magazine lying on the bed.

"She's going to write me, Matt, she said so. Often." He turned toward the old man, trying to modify a smile by biting his lower lip. "That so?" Matt tilted his head to one side, and tried to appear nonchalant.

"Uh-huh. I guess this helped." The boy unpinning a small bronze medal from his coat and handed it to Matt.

The old man turned it over in his palm. "Yep. I guess the ladies all admire brave men. They never change, I imagine. Nope," he said slowly. "I guess they haven't changed one bit since the day this medal was pinned on my father by General Grant."
