GALLANT PEDRO
By Robert Abel

WNU Features

THE military courtyard was as quiet as only a cemetery can be; and the firing squad at parade rest were as motionless as tombstones. Pedro Gomez and I stared at each other. I couldn't help but admire that splendid body of Pedro's; so vibrant, so at ease. I noticed the arrogant tilt of his handsome head; the half smile on his lips.

I remembered the first time I had met him. Four years ago I had trailed a killer to a little saloon in Caliente. As I stepped from the blazing glare of the torrid sun into the semi-dark saloon, I was temporarily blinded. I could not see a thing; but not so the killer.

But the movement was never completed for the long black whip coiled around his arm like a boa and yanked him off his feet. I had him trussed in an eye-wink.

I turned to my rescuer, a tall, handsome laughing caballero. "Captain," he said, "I am Pedro Gomez." He said it as though Pedro Gomez meant a name to be reckoned with. It was. He was the chief lieutenant of that rebel leader - Pancho Villa. His fame or infamy was only second to his chief's.

I thanked Pedro for saving my life. "I am Manuel Beuno."

The second he spied me he cocked his heavy gun and raised it to his shoulder for the aim that means a quick death.

Two years ago I ran across him for the second time. I was leaning against the bar of the "Devil's Drink" when the doors swung open and several men entered. They spied me.

"A Carranza! Let's get him!" They were on me before I could turn. I fought for my life. My breath came in gasps. My arms felt like I was holding up heavy logs. I can't recall how many times I went down and came up, or how many men I knocked sprawling.

Suddenly a loud roar pierced through the fog that engulfed my dizzy swirling brain. The world had come to a standstill. Only heavy panting and breathing disturbed the otherwise silent room.

Someone lifted me gently from the floor. I could hear his voice scream in anger. "This is my friend. Who dares kill a friend of Pedro Gomez?" He looked like a keg of dynamite about to explode. The men slunk out of the saloon. It was Pedro, all smiles again, apologizing and asking my forgiveness for the stupidity of his men. He depreciated his deed with a wave of his hand and a shake of his head. "It is nothing."

After a few drinks he again asked me to join his army. "The government is practically in our hands, Manuel." He looked at me sadly. "I might not be able to help you a third time, my friend. Your government is always putting Villa's captured men in front of a firing squad."

He gulped his whisky down with gusto. "Pancho says he will put all of Carranza's men against the wall, too."

Another drink and then he told me to leave town. Pancho and the rest of his men would soon arrive, and, he shrugged his shoulders, Pancho might not like me like he did.

That was two years ago . . . and here was our third meeting . . . Pedro and I staring at each other. Come, come, Manuel," he said to me. "Be brave. We all have to die sometime. I know you would rather die when you are young and brave; and not when you become old and feeble and are scared of death."

He was right. That is the way I would rather die. How tall and proud Pedro looked. I slowly straightened out my body. I thrust my shoulders back and closed my eyes. I could hear a hoarse voice; it sounded as though it came from my very inners. . . . Ready. . . . Aim. . . . Fire!!! Five shots blended into a single echo. The unerring aim of the firing squad had found its mark. I opened my eyes in time to see Pedro smile at me.

Slowly . . . slowly Pedro's magnificent vibrant body, so full of life a moment before, wilted like a tottering scarecrow and sagged lifeless to the ground.
