Machines Harvest Eastern Forests

Fast, Triple-bladed Saw Cute Troos Into 4' Longths. (Right) Rear View of "Sulky"

Life in the forest is keeping up with the times. Mechanization has mereased production and wages; and modern housing proviles amendles for the workers. Here are seen some of the completely mechanized pulpwood, operations on the north shore of the St. Lawrence river near Forestville, Quebec. In this modern pulpwood camp, the buildings are bright, well insulated. and provided with electricity and other comforts. Camps such as this are portable and are moved mobile equipment make for greater forest protaction and more efficient harvesting of the wood.

The pulpwood is used to produce pulp and paper which accounts for one sixth of the annual wood consumption to Canada. Half again as much wood is wasted by fire, insects, and disease, the ravagers of the forests which the pulp and paper mills fight on their limits. In the operations pictured above, machines lighten much of the men's work. The choppers still fell the trees, but winches drag the logs to the road and massive, sulkies pick them up, handling 20 tons of wood at a time. When manufactured into pulp and paper, the pulpwood harvest creates Canada's greatest single export accounting for 44 per cent of all our exports to the United States.
