Symbol of victory in Canada's top-ranking golfing event . . . the Canadian Open—the Seagram Gold Cup is said to be the most beautiful and most costly of all Canadian sports trophies. Unfortunately for Canadian golf pros, it is also the trophy which has spent the greatest proportion of its life outside this country.

Some day, no doubt, a Canadian will win Canada's own national golf Open — something that hasn't happened since the Gold Cup came into existence. The home-breds get another chance over the Toronto St. George's course June 22-25, but as usual they will be facing the stiffest of world-ranking competition seeking the $10,000 in prize money put up the Cup's donors.

Wrought by the same skilled Canadian craftsmanship which created outstanding gifts for Queen Victoria in another era, the Gold Cup stands 22 inches high. Set in a massive onyx base is the golden casket containing the parchment scroll of winners and mounted on heavily chased silver feet. Two golden bearers act as additional supports, and the Canadian coat of arms and the words "Seagram Gold Cup" are executed on the front.

Atop the casket is the Seagram Cup itself, in Grecian design and made of gold. It carries the crest of the Royal Canadian Golf Association and the words "Canadian Open Golf Championship — For Annual Competition."

Since it became the winner's trophy for the Open in 1936, the Cup has spent probably no more than a month or so each year in this country. Year after year it has been around at tournament time only to be bundled off by its American winner to grace some U.S. clubhouse until the next tournament. The only exception to its usual north-south trips came two years ago when Bobby Locke won the Open and paved the way for its longest excursion — an ocean voyage to South Africa.

In many ways this continual flitting about of some $10,000 worth of ornament isn't as simple as it might seem. Because of the Cup's high gold content and because of a variety of international regulations governing the shipment of gold, each trip of the trophy involves quite a sheaf of insurance, customs and various other permits and documents.

Occasionally the Cup gets bogged down in transit while border red tape is untangled, but by and large it leads a pretty quiet life between tournaments. It has never, for instance, been left sitting on the sidewalk by exuberant winners as is said to have been the case once in the life of hockey's famous award, the Stanley Cup.
