The Adventures of Flitt the Butterfly

by Robin Wynn
FLITT RETURNS TO THE GREEN FOREST

It was a speedy journey to the surface of the ocean. Flitt's baby sea horse, Sparky, gave him a thrilling ride and pulled up close to the shore amidst a swirl of foam. They said Goodbye, and then Flitt was on his way back to the Green Forest.

What a thrill it was to be home again, to smell the sweet perfume of the forest, and see the familiar lakes and trees and gurgling streams! The sun was just coming up as Flitt arrived at his home. As he opened his door, the sound of pots and pans rattling greeted him. Someone was in his kitchen, and someone was singing a merry tune. Who else could that be but Mr. Sunbeam?

Mr. Sunbeam looked up in surprise when he heard Flitt's step. "Welcome home, Flitt, welcome home! We've surely missed you. Did you have a good holiday?" asked Mr. Sunbeam.

"Just wonderful," said Flitt. "But it is grand to be home again. As soon as we've had our breakfast, let's visit all our friends in the Green Forest."

They spent an exciting day, with all the Green Forest folk so happy to welcome Flitt home again. Flitt was really tired that evening as he settled down in his own little bed. How nice it felt to be home again! Flitt was just dozing off, to sleep when the spider telephone started to ring. How he hoped it was the wrong number, for he was so tired and sleepy. But no such luck — it just rang and rang so loud that Flitt hopped out of bed and with his usual cheery "Hello", answered the phone. All he could hear at the other end of the line was the baby rabbit trying to comfort someone, who was sobbing as if her heart would break right into little pieces. Finally Flitt heard a fearful "Hello Flitt, could you come to help me?"

It was Mrs. Nightingale who went on to explain that Mr. Nightingale had gone out with Baby Nightingale to see if they could find a new home, as theirs had been struck by lightning. They had been gone for hours, and tho' Mrs. Nightingale had searched and searched, she couldn't find them. We can just understand how worried she would be, can't we?

Now Flitt was really in a quandary. As you know, butterflies can't see at night, but Flitt felt that he just had to help Mrs. Nightingale, who always sang so beautifully for them.

"But how can I do it," Flitt thought. "If only Mr. Sunbeam could come out at night, or if only I had some lamps of some kind, I would be all right."

Suddenly he hopped up, rang the baby spider's number and asked to speak to Mrs. Nightingale. "Don't worry any more," he said. "I think we've found a way to look for Mr. Nightingale and Baby Nightingale

He could tell by Mrs. Nightingale's voice that she was happier already.

"I'll be over very soon," Flitt said, and hung up the phone.

On his way, he stopped at the Fire-Fly village. My, what a lovely sight it was, with thousands of tiny lights everywhere! You know how they show their strong little lights all the time but just when they need it to find their way or to show each other where they are in the dark. Of course, if they make a special effort, they can show their light steady and strong like a tiny flashlight.

Flitt explained the situation to the Firefly Chief who listened very carefully, nodding his head to show that he understood what Flitt wanted. When Flitt had finished explaining, he blew his tiny whistle and before you could say Goo Willikers one and a half times, there were thousands of tiny lights everywhere. Flitt was amazed at the light — he had no idea that the fireflies could make the Green Forest so bright.

"Why, that's better than really bright moonlight," he told the chief.

Everything was as quiet as a bundle of fluff as the chief spoke to his village of bright little people. He explained to them what they were to do, and then they flew off with their tiny lights shining brightly, making a path for Flitt to see. They searched back and forth thro the forest, looking for Father Nightingale and Baby Nightingale.

After hours of searching, Flitt was almost ready to give up, when he saw all the Fireflies gather together. Such a bright light they made! And there just below them Flitt could see Mr. Nightingale with one wing caught under a piece of old log that had fallen on him. Beside him stood Baby Nightingale looking so frightened.

It was just a matter of minutes to find Mr. Woodpecker and his family. Before Baby Nightingale had realized what they were doing, the woodpeckers had just pecked that old log right to pieces, and Mr. Nightingale's wing was released. They discovered it wasn't broken but just bruised, so they all hurried back to tell Mrs. Nightingale the good news. You can imagine her surprise as she waited and watched and then saw Mr. Nightingale and Baby Nightingale coming toward her in a path of light made by thousands of fireflies with their bright little lamps glowing.

How proud she was when she learned that Baby Nightingale had been a brave little fellow and had not even whimpered! She soon had the bruised wing made comfortable and Baby Nightingale, tucked into bed.

The fireflies, lighted their little lamps again and made another path of light for Flitt to fly home safely. And soon he was off to sleep, happy in the thought that he had been able to help Mrs. Nightingale and that he was back in the Green Forest again.

Have a Happy Holiday

BY FOLLOWING THESE SIMPLE SAFETY RULES

DRIVE SANELY — Every year hundreds of motorists come to grief by not observing proper safety rules. Don't gamble with your life or others.

SWIM SAFELY — Don't take chances which can cause drowning tragedies which mar happy vacations. Common sense can avoid most of the perils of the water.

WATCH YOUR HEALTH — Over-exertion at work or play can cause harmful, lasting effects. Get plenty of rest in hot weather, eat lightly and avoid too much sun.

HOLIDAY TIME IS A HAPPY TIME —

IF You use common sense.
