The Adventures of Flitt the Butterfly

By Robin Wynn

THE GREEN GOBLIN'S CURE

It was bright enough in the Green Forest where Flitt the Butterfly lived with all his friends. But in the hearts of the little people it seemed dark and sad, because the Baby Bunny's Grandmother was very ill indeed. The Wise Old Owl had done his very best to find a cure for the dear old lady rabbit, but she was getting worse instead of better. The squirrels, the birds, and all the rest of the little people had thought of to help her, but to no avail—she just wasn't getting any better. They were all quite discouraged and unhappy.

Flitt the Butterfly had tried and tried to think of a plan to help, but no matter what he did, poor Grandmother Rabbit was falling fast. Finally, Flitt decided to ask the Green Goblin's advice. They seldom bothered the patient little Goblin unless it was a real emergency, because he was always so busy making his wonderful magic.

Flitt tapped on the door of the big cave where the Green Goblin had his home. "Come in," said the kindly Goblin.

"Thank you," said Flitt. Soon he was telling the Green Goblin the sad news about Grandmother Rabbit.

"What seems to be the trouble," asked the Green Goblin.

"I don't know," answered Flitt. "She doesn't even want to eat wild carrots and usually she just loves them."

"My, oh, my! That's really terrible," said the little Old Fellow. "We really must help her some way. I think I know what the trouble is, and I'm afraid it will take a magic potion to cure her. We'll have to hurry so will you ask some of the little people of the Green Forest to help us?"

"I'm sure they will," said Flitt, as he hurried out to call his friends to help in this special time of need. It didn't take long for many of the little people to meet at the Green Goblin's cave, when they knew that they might be able to do something to help Grandmother Rabbit.

In the meantime, the Green Goblin and his helper Jinky were carefully laying out funny-looking bottles, bits of dried bark and many other strange objects.

When all the little people had assembled, he told them that he needed some of them to run rather peculiar errands. He asked the humming bird to bring him some fluff from a dandelion. He asked the turtle to bring him some moss from the creek. But to the green garter snake he gave the hardest job of all. He asked him to get a special root from the deepest underground hole he could find. You can imagine the job that the wriggly little fellow had, testing all the holes in the Green Forest by counting his wriggles as he went down, and then again when he came up, and dividing the number by two. In this way he felt he would be sure to be right!

Finally he found what he was after and hurried back as fast as he could to the cave.

"Now we are ready," said the Green Goblin. He started putting a bit of each of his samples in a long glass bottle. Each time he put something in, it went "ploink" and a blue steam rose to the top of the bottle.

Finally it was time to put in the root that the Green Garter Snake had worked so hard to find. Everyone just held his breath as he carried the root over to the bottle, for they knew it must be something very special.

"Ploink" went the bit of root as it landed in the bottle. But instead of the blue steam, there was a hissing crash, just as if the bottle had exploded. At the same time, streaks of lightning seemed to shoot across the top of the bottle. All the little people covered back in fear while all this was happening.

"Don't be afraid," said the Green Goblin, in his slow, kindly voice. "Nothing will hurt you." As soon as the flashes had quieted down to just a warm glow, the Green Goblin took a long, slim spoon you know the kind that you have in your ice cream soda. He dipped the spoon into the bottle and brought out a tiny bit of the magic potion. It seemed to glow like the firefly's light. Carefully he tasted a little sip, and then nodded his head in approval. My, what a sigh of relief went up from the little people, for they had been so afraid that something might go wrong with Grandmother Rabbit's medicine.

"That will do nicely," said the Green Goblin as he poured the potion in a nice orange-coloured bottle shaped like a carrot.

In a moment, Jinky had brought the Green Goblin's giant dragon fly to the cave door, and in no time at all he was off carrying the Green Goblin with the magic potion to the home of Grandmother Bunny.

Quickly Flitt and the other little people of the Green Forest hurried after him, for they were sure that the magic medicine would help Grandmother Bunny to get well again.

How surprised the old lady rabbit was to have a visit from the kindly Goblin!

"Sip this slowly," said the Goblin, "and it will make you well again."

The Baby Bunny ran to get a spoon, and then gently gave some of the medicine to his Grandmother. No sooner had she tasted it, than she smiled a happy smile.

"I feel better already," she said. Baby Bunny turned to thank the Green Goblin but as usual he had slipped quietly away to his cave. All the little people were overjoyed to see their dear friend getting better and better every minute. Each one felt so grateful to the kindly old Goblin for sharing his magic to make Grandmother Bunny well again.

WIN EIGHT FIRSTS AT PETERBOROUGH HORSE SHOW

Mr. and Mrs. Ken McMillan and daughter Joyce made a wonderful showing with their horses at the Peterborough Horse Show last week-end. They won eight firsts and one second in the events in which they were entered.
