THE SILENT ROAD

The steel road stretches a dead straight line, The product of forest and mine, Plus the hopes, and the fears, The labours and tears, And the lessons unheeded adown the years.

In the ceaseless march of time, In by-gone days o'er its glittering track, There journeyed many a Jock and Mack.

On flying wheels they were borne away, For a crust of bread and a shilling a day; Young and brave, light hearted and gay, And many did not come back.

Deserted now are the miles of steel Stilled in the clang of the laden wheel.

No more do we hear the whistles scream, See the monsters veiled in flying steam, Or the blinding glare of the head-light's beam, And the silence seems unreal.

Maybe some day, and we mean maybe We'll be learned enough and we'll plainly see,

Not all of us were meant for the top, In fact, up there, we'd just be a flop.

And we'll keep on working and never stop, To wrangle o'er the fee.

For then we'll believe what the experts say, That for every cent's increase in pay,

There must be increased at once the price, Of the coal, the bread, the sugar, the rice,

The chocolate bar and everything nice, Not one cent, not even two, but thrice,

We are doubtful of this today, Bill Taylor, Water Street.

TOM GARD'S NOTE BOOK

"Let me live in a house by the side of the road And be a friend to man."

Wonder how many follow this practice? I can't help thinking there would be a marked improvement in man's dealing with man if we all did. It would be equally hard to imagine people of this calibre living in houses that were not attractively landscaped. A few well chosen and artfully placed shrubs will work wonders in transforming the appearance of your property. Right now is the time to transplant them.

Wipe Your Feet

I suppose it is only human nature to put off until tomorrow what you don't feel like doing today! One job I have been avoiding in my own back yard must be done at once, if for no other reason than to keep the housekeeper happy. Invariably dirt tracks into the kitchen on my shoes after a session in the garden, even though I try to be careful. A shoe scraper at the back door is the answer and it will have to be installed before a visit to a marital relations board is involved. I plan to make mine out of an old hoe blade.

Indoor Gardening

Now that the thoughts of the gardener will soon be turning indoors, here are two ideas I'm working on. My picture windows do frame a picture in summer while the garden is in bloom but present a dreary sight at times during the garden's off season. By making a large fernery, I'll be able to enjoy an indoor garden all winter this year. The other idea is one I dug out of a magazine recently. If you enjoy making miniature diorama gardens try the idea illustrated for your containers.

Record Cabinet

If you have an old piano that has finished its period of usefulness, don't scrap it but make a cabinet for records or books out of the frame. By using the old wood and giving it a new finish you'd be surprised at the attractive one that can be made at reasonable cost.
