With Rod and Gun

Hordes of sea lampreys, parasitic scourge of the commercial and game fisheries of the Great Lakes, are now at the peak of their annual spawning run.

Special weirs, or traps, are now being operated by the Department at eight strategic points in known spawning streams to capture lampreys and destroy them before they can lay their eggs.

Operations are centred this year around Lake Huron rivers such as Saugeen, Nine Mile, Sauble, Beaver, Maitland and also the Thessalon and Bridgland rivers and Milford Haven creek which empty into the North Channel.

Last year's operations resulted in the capture and destruction of 16,500 lampreys. The importance of this catch is manifold, fisheries biologists point out, when consideration is given to the fact that one female lamprey is capable of laying 236,000 eggs.

Lampreys started their spawning migration this year on April 28th in the Saugeen River and the run in the various streams is expected to continue until the end of May. As many as 929 of the parasites have been taken in one day by weir operators on the Saugeen.

Methods of trapping the eel like creatures have been under constant experiment and the Department now has standardized methods developed for catching them.

Briefly, a new type of weir developed and being used by the Department consists of a series of perpendicular wooden walls 28" wide and 18" apart fastened to uprights which are in turn attached to logs anchored to the stream bed. These walls serve as dams and the water is forced through the narrow openings between them. Opposite each opening a cylindrical trap is placed.

The lampreys, in attempting to negotiate the strong current racing through the narrow openings are washed into traps, and are unable, due to the funnel shaped opening, to escape.

Operators, stationed at the weirs, can reach the traps, to empty them of their catch periodically by a catwalk placed across the structures.

The sea lamprey, which is a pseudo fish, closely resembling an eel, feeds on fish by fastening itself by means of its round disklike mouth to its prey where it remains

MACKENZIE NEWS

This is a good week to pay your taxes and order your coal. You can then go with a free mind to the races, on your vacation or concentrate on your golf, bowling or fishing.

We have both Nut and Stove coal in this week and the price is $24.50 per ton. Give us a call at 33 and we will try to make delivery to suit your convenience.

See you cutting your grass. (It probably needs it).
