Manners Still In Style

One thing never goes out of style; that is never old-fashioned—good manners. Those of us who are in the public eye frequently find that our manners have a great deal to do with the fact as to whether we are received well or not.

As we learned most of our good behavior and consideration for the comfort and welfare of others in our homes before we ventured far afield so we in turn must teach our children good manners.

Children are usually taught to say "thank you," "please" and "pardon" or "excuse me." But it is necessary to reach other ways of deportment also. How many children know how to behave during a concert or public meeting? A teacher once discussed this phase of behavior with her class of pupils after a program during which there seemed a great deal of undue disturbance. The pupils helped her to draw up the following rules which would help make a good audience:

Keep your feet still—
Keep your hands still; don't plague the person ahead of or beside you—
Keep your voice still; don't annoy those who are interested and listening by whispering or making un-couth sounds.
Use your eyes and your ears, so you won't have to ask another too many questions concerning what is going on.

Then use these rules and you will enjoy the programmes.

Go with your children to concerts and programmes in the school. Watch how they behave and if they do things which cause others to lose interest in the proceedings set them right privately. Best of all set them a good example by observing these rules at all times whether it be in a movie or a small meeting.

Good manners are the outward expressions of the consideration we feel for others.

Don't let the children think they are being sissies because they have this consideration for others; unconsciously practice them at all un-consciously practice them at all times.
