We, Too, Can Celebrate

Searching for a proper post-Coronation editorial, a rural reader, whose letter appears in another section of the paper, gave us the cue. The clipping which was enclosed from the Globe & Mail so aptly fitted, that we are taking the liberty of reproducing it in its entirety. We share the city paper's sentiments, with one proviso . . . Two parades so close together would not work in a small town. We suggest that plans be kept in mind for 1954 Dominion Day. Here is what the Globe says:

Canadians made a big display of patriotism on Coronation Day, and they enjoyed it thoroughly. With flags and fireworks, hymns and hot dogs, speeches and street dances, they told the world about their affection for the Crown in general, and Queen Elizabeth in particular. Even the tiniest communities arranged a program of some sort, while the large ones staged services and spectacles which must have run into many thousands of dollars.

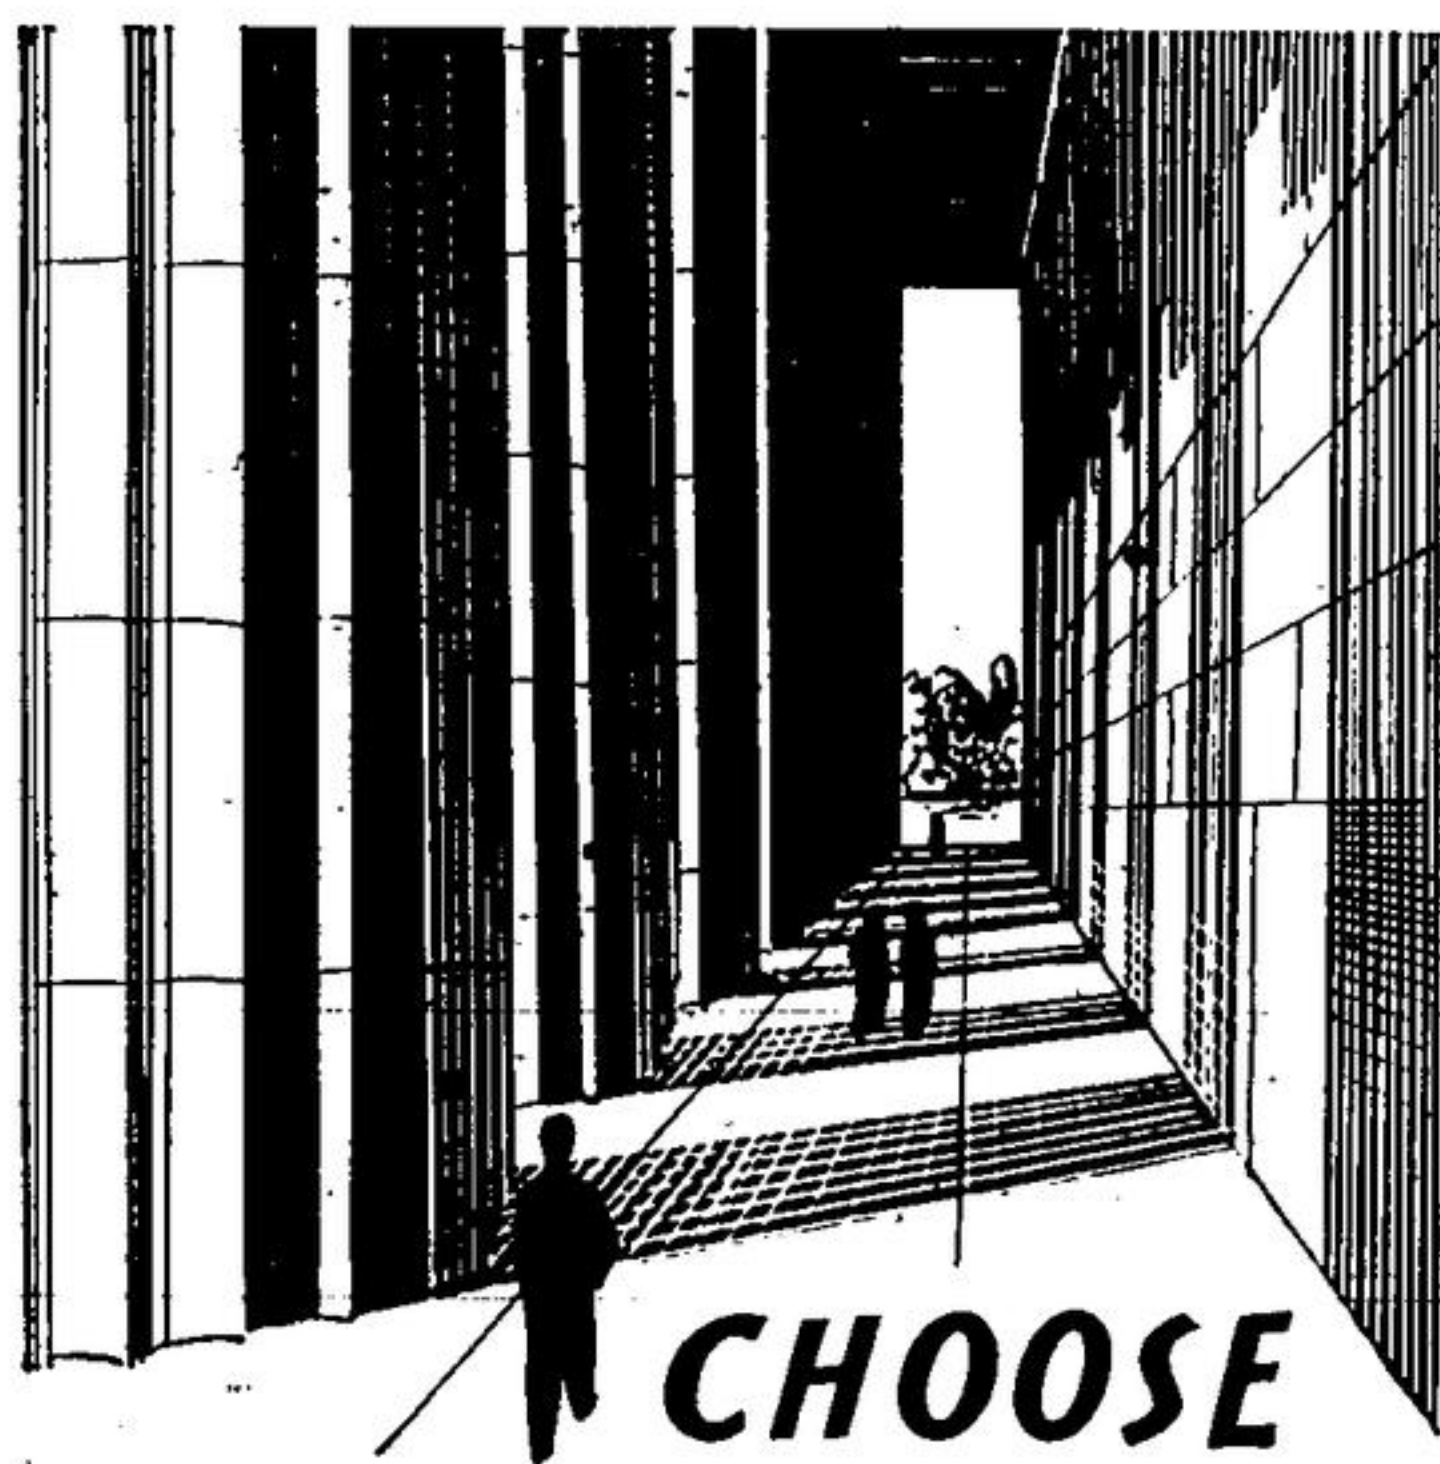

The biggest show was in Ottawa, where seven thousand troops, and thousands more spectators, gathered on the great green lawns in front of the Parliament Buildings to hear an address by the Governor General and witness a flying display by the Royal Canadian Air Force. Here in Toronto, brilliant weather brought out big crowds to services at the City Hall and on the University campus. The colorful garrison parade which followed the latter service was seen by 100,000 people. In the suburbs, there were massed choirs, track meets, tree-planting, maypole-dancing and a host of other festivities.

So it went across the nation, proving — if proof were needed — that the people of Canada are deeply attached to the Crown and Commonwealth. It proved something else — that they know how to celebrate an historic occasion. This being so, why don't they do it more often? Specifically, why don't they stage shows like this on their big national holidays, like Dominion Day? If Canadians observed Coronation Day this year, the Canadianism we hear so much about these days would be a great deal stronger.

The people of the United States set great store by their Fourth of July, and they are right. They know — that is why the Coronation fascinated them — that tradition is the lifeblood of nations; that one which neglects its past, neglects its future. From them, from the British and from our own enthusiastic observation of the Queen's ascent to the Throne, we should recognize the importance — not to mention the satisfaction — of colour and ceremony, bunting and bugles. Just four weeks from now, it will be Dominion Day. It is time enough for Canada's communities to arrange something much bigger and better in the way of celebrations than they have had in years past — something more like the ones they enjoyed so greatly last Tuesday.
