Women's Institutes Are Good Neighbours

Good neighboring has always been a practice of a good Women's Institute and not only through such organized projects as working for hospitals, children's shelters, and old people's homes. These groups of rural women seem to find the most original, personal ways of meeting a need as it arises. For instance, the Aylmer Institute started a fund to buy an artificial eye for a young immigrant. Allenwood sends home baking to families in time of bereavement. Allison helped a New Canadian music teacher by giving her the use of their room, rent free, as a place to do her teaching. Another branch reports sending gifts to a woman "whose finances had been exhausted through illness."

Institutes express their neighborliness in sociability, too — especially in sociability with newcomers and strangers in the community.

Beehive Institute in North Wellington has done an interesting piece of work in conducting a cooking school for their new neighbors recently arrived from Holland. The Dutch women asked for this help in learning Canadian ways of cooking and they, themselves, organized the classes. The Canadian Institute women took turns in giving the courses according to their special abilities. The secretary reports — "One of our members offered us the use of her very modern kitchen and the Institute members paid all expenses. We had two classes of Dutch-Canadian ladies, one of women and one of girls. We taught them how to make tea biscuits, muffins, pies, tarts, cakes of all kinds and at their request we continued with lessons on meat and meat substitutes, potato and vegetable dishes. Their progress and their enthusiasm were beyond description. We also sponsored a baking class at the fall fair especially for New Canadians. We gained much in the way of friendship through this project."

Incidentally Kendall reports that their most interesting meeting of the year was the meeting when New Canadian women of the community demonstrated national dishes of their homelands — the Netherlands, Czechoslovakia and Poland. And Huntingdon East's outstanding programme of the year was put on by a visiting Indian Homemakers' Club — the Indian women giving the addresses and the entire program. Exchange visits with Homemakers' Clubs are becoming very popular with Institutes in areas close to an Indian Reserve.

Altogether, being a good neighbor may be one of the most effective things a Women's Institute can do.
