KOREAN ELEGY

The guns no longer boom across the land;
The smoke has disappeared, the air is clear,
And peace abounds as if some unseen hand
Had caused all sounds of war to disappear.

The homes lie ruined, and once fertile soil
Lies bleak and barren, fields once filled with grain
Lie still and empty; the poor farmer's toil,
Has been in waste; it was, now, known, in vain.

The trenches are not manned, the guns are gone;
The soldier's bullet no more kills his foe;
The bright moon shines as long ago it shone,
And no more looks upon man's pain and woe.

What of the dead, who died for Freedom's name?
Their flesh is gone, their spirits here remain,
Live men in human mortal form they came,
And died hard deaths in misery and pain.

There was the load; they bore it well until
They could not one more weary footstep tread,
They tried their heavy, great, task to fulfill,
And find sweet haven in the arms of God.

They fought with courage in the stifling fight,
Their lives they gave; the path lies where they trod;
No more shall they see darkness, only light,
And find sweet haven in the arms of God.

—Michael Muir Norval.
