CPR'S ELECTRONIC "GENIE": A giant, new "electronic brain" with nerve endings in scores of cities, towns and hamlets across Canada has gone to work for the Canadian Pacific Railway. Key figures in the operation of the IBM 705 electronic "genie", capable of producing answers to the most complicated problems in railway paper work, will be local agents who will feed information over the company's communications network from stations and yard offices across the CPR system. Upper left, Miss Dona Hunter operates a "flexowriter" in the Toronto freight office which simultaneously reproduces a punched "tape" carrying information which is transmitted to the Toronto "data centre" along with data supplied by scores of similar operations. The "data centre" similar in its function to the Winnipeg "data centre" shown in the upper right, evaluates and processes this information and, if required, transmits it to the "705" installation in Montreal. Lower inset, M. T. Devlen, general supervisor of the CPR's integrated data procedure research, sits in at the operator's console of the "705". Thus, the giant electronic brain is fed information from widely scattered points on the vast CPR system and results of the processing can be returned to the source by the same procedure.
