FORECAST 10,000 PEOPLE FOR NEW HEART LAKE TOWN

RICHMOND HILL CANOE MAY DATE 5,000 YEARS

A dugout canoe which may be 5,000 years old, found in a lake near Richmond Hill, is going to become a permanent part of the display of pioneer equipment at the Pioneer Museum, Daniel Conservation Area, near Steeles Ave., and Jane St., in northwest suburban Toronto.

Mrs. R. H. Neil, of Thornhill, historical consultant for the Metropolitan Toronto and Region Conservation Authority, said the ancient canoe will go on display soon at the museum.

Dr. Norman Emerson, University of Toronto anthropologist, has suggested that the half-disintegrated craft was built by Laurentian Indians who roamed southern Ontario and New York State more than 5,000 years ago. He described the tribe as being the best woodworkers of ancient days.

Dr. Emerson said, however, that further investigation will have to be made to confirm the age of the canoe, which was discovered at the bottom of Haines Lake, near Richmond Hill, by a skin-diver, Norman Ritchie.

A satellite town on Highway 10 north of Brampton may begin construction next spring. The proposed new town will straddle the highway, ten miles north of Brampton and touches Heart Lake, recently developed as a playground area. A project of the Irmac Corporation, it is to be a self-contained town in which all public services will be underwritten by the developers and the commercial taxpayers of the subdivision.

The company has signed an agreement with Chinguacousy Township. It has options on 865 acres of land and estimates an initial population of 9,000 to 10,000 people. It is believed considerable British capital is involved in the subdivision.

"JUST A MINUTE, LADY," says Malton airport attendant John Magill, "this is aviation gasoline here." But comely Ronnie McLennan is sure her high-powered car needs the same gasoline as the planes at Malton. Her rather exaggerated demands are not so far from the truth as they were in the past, for the public's demand for powerful cars is forcing gasoline makers to produce higher and higher quality gasoline, at enormous expense for new refining equipment. The Imperial Oil Review warns in its August issue that higher prices are a likely result of the horsepower race. —Imperial Oil photo.

ONLY BY BUILDING expensive new equipment have gasoline manufacturers been able to keep pace with the development of high-horsepower automobile engines. The tower at the left is part of a 'powerformer', the newest in refining equipment. It is designed to meet motorists' demands for better fuels for high compression engines, and produces the necessary high octane gasoline although it does not increase production. The unit shown above is at Imperial's Sarnia refinery, and the company is installing them from coast to coast. The Imperial Oil Review warns in its August issue that higher prices are a likely result of the horsepower race.
