Sugar and Spice

Dispensed by BILL SMILEY of the Wilson Cafe

Progress is a wonderful thing. The huge strides of science leave one gasping. Those of us who have lived a few years have to stop and shake ourselves once in a while as we survey the prodigious surge of man's knowledge.

Then he donned his rubber gloves and performed a bit of business that is best left to the imagination. Suffice it to say that he wound up wiggling my tailbone with the tip of his finger. And I don't mean from the outside. By the time he was finished, I felt like one of the Sabine maidens.

Shattered and shaken, I climbed back into my clothes. The specialist said I'd better have X-rays, to make sure. I was getting pretty worried. When he said a blood test would be a good idea, too, I was near panic, but gamely agreed.

So I went to the hospital, donned a butcher's coat over my shivering nakedness and was snapped from all angles. Then a callous young woman with a cold in her nose sucked a pint or two of blood out of my arm. I didn't mind her apparent enjoyment of the ordeal, but was a bit annoyed by her scornful laughter just before I keeled off the stool in a faint.

Three days later I got the bill from the hospital. X-rays $28.00. Blood, $3.00. Then I went back for my interview with the back specialist. I was braced for the worst: cancer, tertiary arthritis, a warped spine. He greeted me gravely. I grew pale. He pulled out the X-rays, took a look, and shook his head.

Everything confirms my clinical observations," he told me. My heart plummeted into the region of the duodenal ulcer. "There is no indication of any bone, muscular or infectious disorder," he continued. "Everything points to the fact that there is no chronic irritation in the lumbar region."

"What does that mean, Doctor?" I quavered. "Well," he smiled brightly, "the laymen might say you have a sore back, but I should hesitate to put it quite so simply."

It took a few minutes for that to sink in. When it did, exercising the utmost control, I asked him for his bill, paid it, went home and got the Old Lady to rub some liniment on my back and wrap it in flannel. It feels pretty good right now.

Nice young fellow, he was. Asked me a lot of questions, like did I have many sore throats. Hit me on the knees with a little hammer. Looked in the ears. Measured my legs, like I needed a new suit, maybe. Listened to the heart with the cold thing. Stuck pins in me all over and asked if I could feel them. Very impressive.

Finally, he got around to the back. "Does that hurt?" he asks, pushing his finger so far into my back I thought it would come out the front. Apparently my howl of anguish satisfied him. He stood back and nodded in a satisfied way.

Conservation Head Warns Danger Forest Fires

"The months from April through October are those when greatest enjoyment is afforded us in our woodlands and pleasure parks—and when fire is the greatest hazard to that enjoyment," says G. Ross Lord, chairman of Metropolitan Toronto and region Conservation Authority, commenting on the Forest Fire Prevention program of the Department of Lands and Forests.

The Conservation Authority, according to Dr. Lord, is taking positive steps to ensure that every visitor to its 1,200 acres of conservation areas will be fully aware of the need for good fire precaution practices. The field officers and all personnel on the MTRCA lands hope to enlist the active co-operation of everyone, young and old. Especially in the big areas such as Heart Lake, Boyd, Albion Hills, Greenwood and Dalsiel is potential hazard the subject of extra vigilance.

"We want to impress on every visitor to our woods, nature trails and camp sites that the danger of a fire in a comparatively small wooded area is just as serious as in the big forests of north-western Ontario. A woods destroyed by fire cannot be replaced in the lifetime of a generation."

On all the big conservation sites of MTRCA, hot water and soft drinks are available and there is very little need for fires. When fires are considered necessary they can be lighted only in the fire-places that have been built by the Authority for that purpose.

The public generally has become very conscious of fire dangers in the same way that it has come to think of the danger of road accidents. But when the habit of caution is relaxed for one second, it may be too late to avert disaster. The continued enjoyment of our public woodlands depends very much on the care we take when we picnic or walk through the woods, says Dr. Lord.

Dairy Farmers Spend Three Million Dollars Advertising

Answering the charge that farmers are always asking for help, Dairy Farmers of Canada, the national producer's organization, points to the three million dollars of their own money that farmers have put into advertising during the past eight years. Officials of the producer organization explain that it has cost farmers, who have participated, an average of 30 cents per cow per year to play an important part in keeping their milk and milk products before the consumer. If all dairy farmers had participated in the program, which is financed by a set-aside deduction of a cent-a-pound on butterfat marketed during the month of June, about five million dollars would have been available for advertising during the last eight years. Producers in various parts of Canada who have been supporters of the program have recommended in recent years that the basis of set-aside be increased so that the promotion might be stepped up.

Moving on to solid accomplishments of their national advertising and promotion program, Erle Kitchen said that the program has had a subsidiary effect in helping to weld together the 36 member producer groups which go to make up Dairy Farmers of Canada, of which he is secretary-manager. He felt the advertising program was a continuing, tangible project which was paying off for the dairy farmer and the industry at large.

O. J. W. Shugg, who has been administrator of the advertising program for Dairy Farmers since its inception, felt that the real worth of the program has been
