Fallout Shelters Added To Home Improvement List

The Hon. A. Keller Roberts, Attorney General of Ontario, in the absence of the Hon. W. M. Nickle, has announced that in conjunction with the June 17th remarks by Canada's Prime Minister, John Diefenbaker regarding the pamphlet entitled "Your Basement: Fallout Shelter," such a shelter is being constructed in Toronto at University Avenue and College Street in front of the Ontario Parliament Buildings. The concrete block and frame shelter, when completed in about a week's time, will be open and available to the public. The work is being done by three members of the Emergency Measures Branch, Dept. of Planning and Development, none of whom are experts nor professional contractors. Materials required will be purchased from building supply firms at regular market prices in order that a full record of costs may be obtained. In addition, many hours of work will be noted so that the average homeowner may be able to judge the time involved in constructing a shelter in his own basement. Mr. Roberts emphasized the fact that survival is everybody's concern and that the Province is building the model fallout shelter in order to interest all families in obtaining the shelter specifications from EMO Press Council Office, Ottawa, and in building their own approved home shelter. W. J. Scott, Q.C., Chairman Ontario EMO, stated that Mr. Diefenbaker announced in the House of Commons that the Federal Government has decided to include home shelters in the schedule of items for which home improvement loans may be made under the National Housing Act, and that action is now underway to implement this decision.

Maple Tree Essay Wins Prize For Grade Sixer

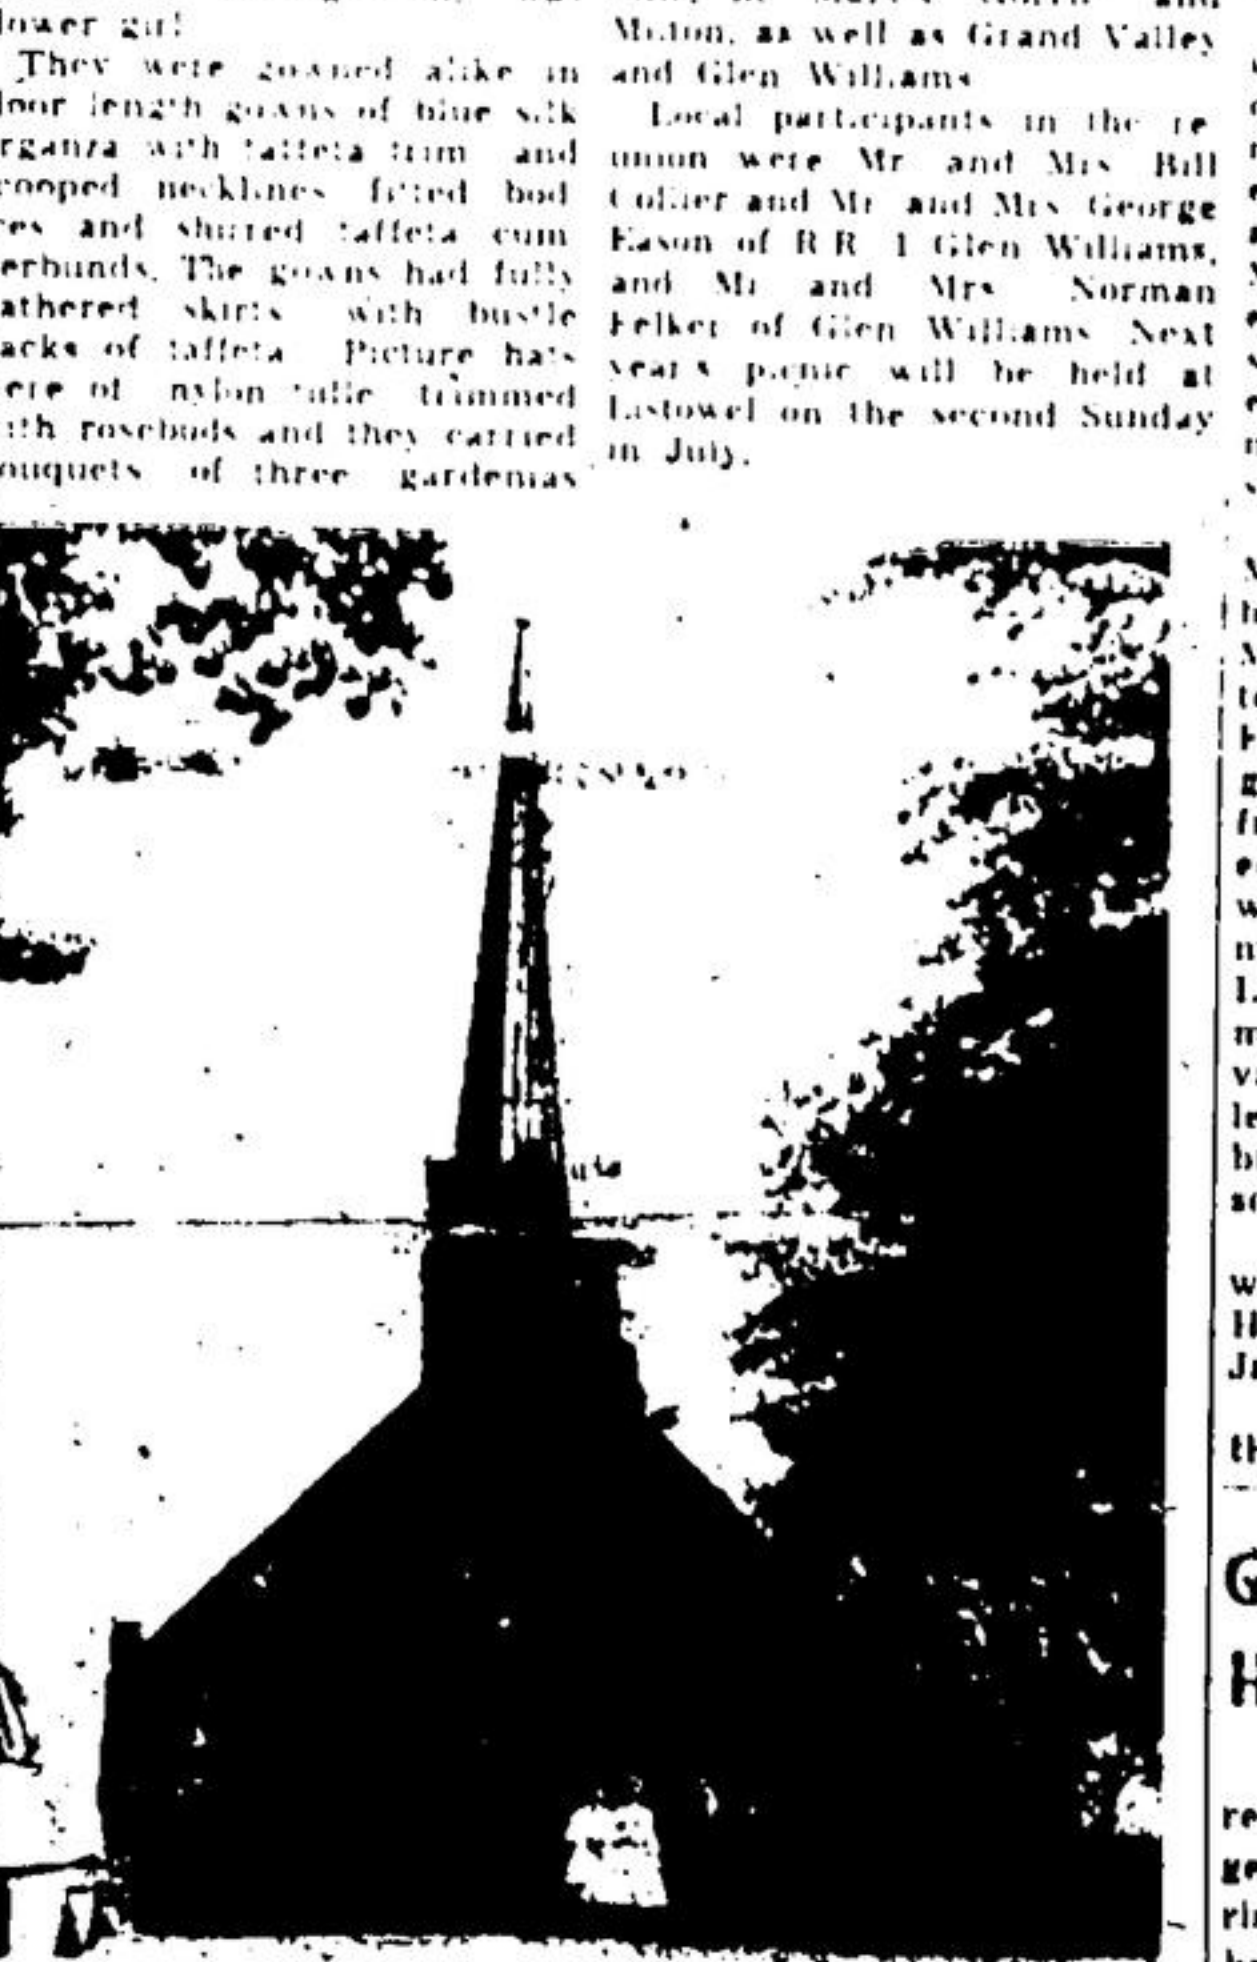

Dorcas, Box 164, student at Holy Cross R.C. School, won first prize with her essay on the Maple Tree, conducted in a contest for school children sponsored by the local Horticultural Society. The essay will be judged again in the provincial contest here in the essay. Most people know that maple syrup comes from the sap of the sugar maple tree. If you have ever been in England in the early spring, you may have seen the taps plugged into the trees and the buckets waiting to catch the flow of sugar sap. When the cold squeezes the trunk of the tree the sugar sap flows out. Sometimes I think it looks and works like a mediocre dropper, because when you squeeze the bulb of a ball medicine dropper, the stiff comes out of it. Also when it is cold the cool pinches the sugar maple tree and out of the trunk comes the sap. When it gets warmer and the warm air comes, the squeezing stops and the sap doesn't flow. That is why sugar maples are always tapped in the winter when it is cold. The leaf factories make the sugar sweet in the sugar maple tree. Every leaf on every green plant in the world is a small factory. Every tree makes a lot of sugar because they have many leaves. But in most trees the sugar changes into other food. The sugar maple is one of the few trees in which the leaf sugar stays pure and sweet. Trees use the sugar made by their leaves for food. Leaves eat up what is animal, including people, can do. They can make sugar out of water and air. No one knows exactly how they do this, but they do know that the leaf factories can only work when there is sunlight. The leaf factories cannot make sugar at night. It cannot run without sun-power, any more than a radio can without electricity. If you were standing under a sugar maple and you looked up into its crown of leaves, you would soon see that each leaf grows on its own twig in a way that helps it get the most sun possible. If you can see a tree from above, the leaves overlap in such a way that one leaf is shade another, no more than necessary. A large sugar maple tree may have as much as half an acre of leaves reaching to the sun. With each leaf getting the sun power, the leaf factories of such a tree produce enough sugar to feed a family of seven. It is for people to tap it every seven years without taking too much sugar from the tree stored in these seven years. You can of Agriculture.
