Short Cut No More
Dial Full Number Now

A short cut often becomes a more widely travelled route than the official footpath — and this is the case in Georgetown, where the telephone users have become used to dialing only the last four or five digits of telephone numbers when placing local calls.

But, says Lloyd G. Denby, local Bell Telephone manager, it was necessary to close this shortcut last Sunday when toll-free calling was introduced between Georgetown and Huttonville.

Mr. Denby explained that when local calling here was confined to Georgetown, telephones, the automatic switching equipment would connect a call when only the last four or in some cases, five digits of a number were dialed.

But with Huttonville added to the local calling area, the equipment can not distinguish whether a call is intended for Georgetown or for Huttonville, when short-cut dialing is used. "It is, therefore, necessary now for customers to dial the complete telephone number," he stressed.
