Just a Cat . . . But We Loved Her!

Biggest drawback to having a well-loved pet, is that the hour of parting inevitably arrives. And when it does, you find a child, especially, is sad and difficult. This I have been trying to do for the past week, since our Boots became a victim of the Queen Street traffic.

Boots was our cat. To other people she probably appeared quite ordinary, but to us she seemed extra special in every way. She joined our household four years ago as a stray kitten — a coal-smudged, frightened fugitive from Main Street and the cellar of the Herald Office. Her face was her fortune — it made us want to keep her. She had a pretty one — gray with white markings. And she eventually fulfilled her early promise by turning into a very attractive, dainty, lady like cat.

Another interesting little episode occurred which I was away at the children's cottage with the children. Two mysterious puddles appeared every week in the house, and always in the same place — one at each end of the table — record player. Boots, who had no doubt upset at the chance in her living room, was the culprit. Praise be to enough to mess the new rug, was the thought uppermost in my mind when they told me about it.

When I arrived home sure enough there were two new puddles awaiting us. I was a little upset, because of course the moisture had left marks on the floor. But as I mopped them up, I became a little puzzled too. The puddles were completely odorless, and gave every appearance of being just plain water. This made me very doubtful about the cat being responsible.

To be on the safe side, however, I made very sure Boots was kept outside as much as possible. But the puddles appeared again anyway. And the next week too, I was mopping up puddles. It was very puzzling. The radio-record player is against an inside wall, with no windows near, and certainly no leaks were visible in the ceiling above or floor below. The big question was, "Did she or didn't she?"

A brilliant friend of the family found the solution to the mystery.

A tell-tale bit of moisture on the upper shelf of the record player gave him the important clue. The puddles were coming from the F. M. wires. They had apparently been attached to the antennae of the radio, and over the years raindrops had accumulated in the space between the F. M. wires. Shutting her up in the dining room to cool off, I went back down to try to capture the trespasser. By this time, the frightened creature had retreated to the most inaccessible corner of the basement. I had to use strategy, in the form of a dish of raw liver to lure him out. When he was fully absorbed in his feast, I poked him up, bit of liver and all, and put him out into the night from whence he had come. Ask me not how.

Boots, in common with nearly all cats, was very clean as far as personal habits were concerned. The only time she made a mistake, it wasn't her fault. We had taken an all-day trip with the family, and through a misadventure each thought the other had put the cat out. When we arrived home, there was a very wet spot right in the middle of the living room rug, and a very muddy looking cat to greet us. She had apparently heard our frightened fugitive from Main Street and the cellar of the Herald Office. Her face was her fortune — it made us want to keep her. She had a pretty one — gray with white markings. And she eventually fulfilled her early promise by turning into a very attractive, dainty, lady like cat.

Hat Making Shown in W.I. Demonstration

The W.I. held its meeting on Tuesday afternoon, January 16th at the home of Mrs. W.I. Hat with president Mrs. Fred Nourse opening at two o'clock with the one and a half hour. Secretary read the minutes of the December meeting and called the roll which was answered by one method I have for estimating. The ladies all learned a few ways of making.

Mrs. Thomas Gillen reported on the activities that had been carried out by the ladies of the W.I. Hat Club since the last meeting. She mentioned the making of hats and the fact that the members had even had a party. She also mentioned that the ladies had been busy with their hats and that they had been very successful in their work.
