Diary of a Vagabond

BY DOROTHY BARKER

CANINE CUTS LOOSE

The Red Cap was having trouble with the dog's tail. As fast as he looked it up, the wooden crate it would get out and a whine of protest would follow.

"Come on Butch, settle down," I called the Red Cap.

"I beg your pardon but he's not Butch, she's Janey," said a wisp of a woman in a patterned dress.

"The same thing to help him," she said. "I'm Janey."

"We were all standing in line at the Union Station to check our baggage when the elderly woman had opened the door 'just to peek and see if Janey was all right.'

"Janey was as scared as her mistress, for neither had ever traveled far from home. Both were headed for a new and strange harbor, where a daughter had offered a lifetime mortgage for her elderly mother and this aging pet.

This information had all tumbled out as the previous small passenger jugged at her carry-all and ran the dog's leash through her fingers.

"I was trying to comfort her and tell her how happy she would be in her residence with her daughter when Janey, with a wave of her hand, slipped through the crates and started down the full length of the station's foyer looking like a veiling tail-wagging bundle of fur about to bolt into place but back in the crate.

Red Caps, passengers, baggage handlers and gatekeepers all lunged in an effort to capture Janey. They had one thing in their favor. The inclement weather had closed all station windows and it was just a matter of cornering the fractious animal.

The more we all grabbed for her as she ran by, the more wily she became in eluding us.

Finally her mistress regained her composure. She called, "Janey, heels," in a commanding voice much too big for her small frame.

The little dog crawled on her belly until she was at the heels of her mistress who picked her up and, without any further nonsense or coaxing, pushed her into the crate and "hatted" down the latch.

"These lovely marine forms were all hers. She had been the wife of a lake captain, she told me, and when disaster faced her and the one she loved she took command. I shan't worry about how these two fared when they reached their destination. I am sure the captain's wife will know how to take charge if the going gets rough.
